OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

NO TAX ON WINE AND BEER THE SLOGAN—SENATE EXPECTED TO CONSIDER RECLASSIFICATION BILL—WOMEN'S JOINT CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE—NEW PEACE DOLLAR—BETTER CARE OF FEEBLE-MINDED IN WASHINGTON POSSIBLE IF APPROPRIATION IS MADE

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

No Tax on Wine and Beer the Slogan

The proposal of the opponents of prohibition for a tax on wine and beer has received no cordial response on the part of leaders in Senate and House, but should the proponents of such a tax ask for a hearing, it would be given, so it behooves the Woman's Christian Temperance Union to register protests with Mr. Fordney, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, such as will convince the committee that the women of the country will not stand for changing a great fundamental law for the sole purpose of raising revenue. Continue to send telegrams by hundreds to Secretary of the Treasury Mellon and Mr. Fordney, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

Senate Expected to Consider Reclassification Bill

Senator Sterling, chairman of the Committee on Civil Service, is planning to call a meeting immediately after the reconvening of Congress, January 3, to consider the Reclassification Bill.

It is expected that the Sterling Bill, which is similar to the Lehlbach Bill, which has passed the House, will be reported to the Senate. Other measures are before the committee. The W. C. T. U. has endorsed the Reclassification Bill. Write your senators of your interest in this measure, respectfully asking their support. Refer to the Washington Letter in THE UNION SIGNAL of December 8 for detailed information in regard to the bill.

Ex-President Wilson Has a Birthday Anniversary

Former President Wilson observed his sixty-fifth birthday anniversary December 28 in the quiet of his lovely home in Washington. Birthday messages from all parts of the country showered upon him. During the afternoon Mr. Wilson, accompanied by Mrs. Wilson, went for his usual drive. His friends believe that Mr. Wilson's health has greatly improved during the past year.

The Women's Joint Congressional Committee

The Women's Joint Congressional Committee is the outcome of a movement on the part of the great national organizations of women to cooperate for the support of Federal legislation which affects the interests of women in particular and makes for good government in general.

The Joint Committee was organized as a clearing house for the discussion of Congressional legislation in which various organizations are interested. Many organizations are working for the same measures and, through the Joint Committee, during its one year of existence, it has been proved that useless duplication may be avoided and there may be less working at cross purposes.

The function of the Women's Joint Congressional Committee itself, therefore, has been confined to that of a clearing house for its member organizations. The active work in support of legislation has devolved upon the subcommittees, which are composed of representatives from those organizations which have endorsed specific measures.

During the year nine subcommittees have been formed, each one having a membership of at least three organizations. These subcommittees are as follows: Towner-Sterling Department of Education; Fess Home Economics Amendment; Industrial Legislation; Independent Citizenship; Packer Legislation; Child Labor; Social Hygiene; Fess-Capper Physical Education; Prohibition.

These subcommittees have been in close touch with the sponsors of their respective measures in Congress and, when the situation justified it, have initiated and participated in hearings, have interviewed Senators and Congressmen, made polls of both houses, and on the whole endeavored to "marshal their facts in such a manner as to convince Congressmen of the justice of their claims and to secure the passage of their measures on the sound basis of actual conviction on the part of Congressmen, backed by a clear demand on the part of their constituents."

The one outstanding feature of the composite legislative program was the enactment into law of the Maternity and Infancy Bill with the President's signature on the day before Thanksgiving. During the early days of the short session of the sixty-sixth Congress, it had become clear that only by concentration upon one of the welfare measures then before Congress was there any chance of success. The choice was made of the so-called Sheppard-Towner Bill and, through the Sheppard-Towner subcommittee, which eventually included all the organizations of the Joint Committee, the concentrated interest of the great bodies of organized women throughout the country was brought to both senators and representatives during the last two sessions of Congress.

The organizations most active in this work, whose representatives on the Women's Joint Committee accepted the responsibility and directed the tactics of the campaign, were the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, General Federation of Women's Clubs, National Consumers' League, and the National League of Women Voters.

A second achievement which may be claimed as a result of co-operation secured through the Women's Joint Congressional Committee, not so spectacular but quite as significant, was the appropriation by Congress in its special session of $225,000 for the work of the Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board. This appropriation, without which the Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board would automatically have ceased to exist on July 1, last, failed entirely in the regular appropriation bill of the preceding session because of a difference of opinion regarding the functions of the Board and the U. S. Public Health Service. The part that the women's organizations played in bringing about conferences to reconsider these differences and in securing the appropriation, was specifically recognized by Surgeon General Ireland when he announced the appointment of Dr. Valeria Parker, National Woman's Christian Temperance Union superintendent of Social Morality and affiliated with many other organizations, as the new director of this governmental board.

Only one measure other than the Sheppard-Towner Bill for which a subcommittee was organized has become a law during the year. This was the Packer Control Bill which passed both houses in August.

The subcommittees have kept informed on the status of the measures and have rendered monthly reports to the Women's Joint Congressional Committee, ever ready to begin work when the situation demanded it.

New Peace Dollar

Coinage of a new silver dollar, to be known as the "peace dollar," will soon begin at the Philadelphia mint.

The design of the new coin was shown President Harding by Raymond T. Baker, Director of the Mint, and was said to have met with the President's hearty approval. Already it had been approved by Mr. Baker and Secretary Mellon.

Dies for the new dollar were cast in Philadelphia, where dies for all coins are made. Coinage began December 28. The new pieces will be made exclusively at the Philadelphia mint for a month, after which their production will be taken up by other mints. It is planned to coin between 700,000 and 800,000 this year.

The new dollar was designed by Anthony De Francisci, a New York sculptor, who competed with seven other artists. The designs submitted were gone over by the Fine Arts Commission.

On the back of the coin is an eagle on a mountain top. Near the eagle is an olive branch of peace. Back of the mountain can be seen the first rays of a new era. On the front is a new head of the Goddess of Liberty, with the familiar words "Liberty" and "In God We Trust."

Better Care of Feeble-Minded in Washington Possible If Appropriation Is Made

In the District Appropriation Bill, now before a House committee, there is an item authorizing and directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to acquire a site for a home and school for feeble-minded persons and to erect thereon suitable buildings at a total cost not exceeding $300,000.

This is new legislation and is, therefore, subject to a point of order, but, as the Director of the Budget has sanctioned the appropriation, it is hoped there will be no objection to it.

For years the Board of Charities has been recommending the erection of a proper institution for the care and training of the mental defectives of the District. In the regrettable absence of such an institution, an arrangement has been in effect since 1902 whereby Congress makes an annual appropriation for the Board of Children's Guardians to enable it to provide for the feeble-minded children intrusted to its care, but this arrangement admittedly fails to measure up to the situation.

Support will not be withdrawn from the Tinkham Bill, which has been pending for several years and is a measure providing for an institution for mental defectives and the law under which the institution shall operate, but concerted effort will be made by all charitable welfare organizations to secure this appropriation, as proposed in the District Appropriation Bill.

Prohibition and Suffrage For Mexico?

A special dispatch appears in the Chicago Tribune stating that Mexico may adopt prohibition, according to Gen. Plutarco E. Calles, minister of interior and head of the Obregon cabinet who was recently in New York, where he was interviewed on the subject.

Gen. Calles said the woman's suffrage movement was growing vigorously and that Mexican women probably would get the vote eventually.

Alcoholism on Decline in Ohio

The number of deaths due to alcoholism of any form in Ohio is said to be steadily decreasing. According to the Cleveland (Ohio) Press, records of the State Bureau of Vital Statistics show that thus far in 1921 there have been approximately 100 deaths from alcoholic poisoning. All reports are not in and the total may slightly exceed this number. Prior to the passage of the prohibitory law the number of deaths reported was far greater, totaling 429 in 1917, and 355 in 1916. Since 1918 there has been a steady decline.

Women At Men's Banquets

In former years no woman would ever have dreamed of sitting in the balcony at a men's banquet to hear the speeches. The fact that liquors were served was an effectual deterrent. With the coming of prohibition all this has been changed, and the number of women who seek admittance to the balcony, or gallery, as the case may be, of halls where banquets are held, is constantly increasing. Regular numbered tickets, like those for the banqueters, are made out for them.

German Socialists Favor Prohibition

Noting the tremendous industrial and other advantages that the United States is deriving from prohibition, the Independent Socialist Party of Germany has, according to the Christian Science Monitor, "announced its intention of submitting a general alcohol prohibition measure in the Reichstag."

Germans Asked to Copy "Dry" U. S.

Dry America was held up to Germany as an example she might do well to follow by no less a newspaper than the Frankfurter Zeitung, according to a press dispatch recently received from Berlin. A report from the statistical department of Lubeck was quoted showing that the relief missions of the city are overburdened with cases of drunkenness. These are attributed to the increasing habit of drinking at bars in the one time American fashion. After the bars had been voted out of America they seem to have become relatively more popular in Germany.

"Conditions have developed among families which are beyond description," says the Frankfurter Zeitung in quoting the report, "The public must be informed what the growing danger is so they can co-operate in preventing what remains of our health from being drunk away."

The paper then appends the commendation of the British Chamber of Commerce on the results of prohibition in the United States.

The recent drowning of ten passengers in one of the little lake steamers at Wannsee, near Berlin, is said to have been the result of too much drinking on the part of the crew, and this has stirred up much anxiety on the part of the public. The managers of other transportation systems, however, declared they were strict in enforcing the non-drinking rule and were furnishing anti-alcohol propaganda to their employees.

"Each Citizen a Guardian of Law"

The good citizen is under obligations to assist in the enforcement of the prohibition law and is in a sense a guardian of all our laws. To me there is a great invisible government back of all of the institutions of government. It is the spirit of America. It is our American idealism. It is our American militant righteousness. It is our progressive civilization and there is something emanating from this invisible power to the hearts of all true Americans, an invisible influence that reaches each citizen and makes him a defender of all those laws which have to do with the welfare of our country and the well-being of our countrymen.

—Federal Prohibition Commissioner Roy A. Haynes.

State Granges Urge Prohibition Enforcement Laws

At the closing session of its annual meeting, the Massachusetts State Grange, according to the Christian Science Monitor, acting upon the recommendation of Harry E. Gardner, state lecturer, urged concurrent legislation by the state to conform "to the letter and spirit of the national prohibition law."

C. Palmer Chapman, master of the Rhode Island State Grange, asked that order to "stand four square against every attempt to restore the curse of the liquor traffic," and to demand the passage of competent liquor enforcement legislation at the coming session of the general assembly.

Another Empty Jail

The jail in Walden, New York, has been abandoned. It has apparently outlived its usefulness, having had no occupants for several months past. Every institution of this kind is a heavy financial burden to the tax-payers. Curious, but "lock-ups" do not seem to thrive under prohibition. Crime needs the stimulus afforded by the saloon.

No Crime Wave In New York

You may have been told that a big crime wave has been sweeping over New York City during the past few months, but the statement is untrue, says Joab H. Banton, district attorney-elect of New York County. According to the North American, Mr. Banton asserts there has been less crime there this past year than in either of the two years preceding.

"New York is the best big city in the world," he said. "There is less crime in proportion to the population than anywhere else, when you consider the ten million people who have access to the city."

Eminent Surgeon Defends Prohibition

One of the foremost surgeons of America, Dr. W. W. Keen of Philadelphia, recently declared at a meeting of the Philadelphia Contemporary Club, that in his opinion total abstinence and prohibition have been of the greatest good to America. He told of addressing the International Congress of Surgeons in Paris and of the reception given his paper:

"To my surprise," said he, as reported by the American Issue, "I found that instead of alienating those men who were in a country noted for its use of alcoholic beverages, my paper delighted them. I found that the foremost surgeons of France were total abstainers.

"Prohibition has brought about less drunkenness in this country, less poverty, less crime, fewer accidents and lesser expenses to city and state, as well as a betterment of standards of health and living. Alcohol has been the principal root of infractions of the law and of accidents. Alcohol is the most powerful and frequent source of immorality and venereal diseases."

In reply to the statement of a Mr. Bridges, who said that his father had drunk light wines and beer without perceptible harm, Doctor Keen said: "How do you know that your father was not affected from a psycopathic standpoint? Drinking of alcohol, it has been shown by tests, diminishes muscular sense, and also is a factor in intellectual deterioration."

Intemperance Lessened, Charity Society Says

Intemperance among the 3,965 families under the care of the Charity Organization Society of New York during the past year has decreased 60 per cent from the figures of 1916, according to a report of Director Lawson Purdy made recently to the central council of the society.

According to Mr. Purdy, the organization looked after 10,982 children during the year. The problems of mental diseases were twice as important as in the previous year, but this was partially accounted for by the increased ability of workers in recognizing these in the earlier, less apparent stages.

Business Men Endorse Prohibition

A survey recently made by the Chicago Daily News among the business men of the city, both in the downtown and the outlying districts, revealed the fact that aside from liquor interests only one type of business would welcome a return to wet conditions. Employment agencies which obtain positions for domestic help and other cheaper kinds of labor, complain that the "turnover" is not as great now as in the days when men grew testy under the influences of intoxicants and lost their jobs more readily. Many lines of business have been helped directly. The candy trade is flourishing, and the large number of empty milk bottles that may be seen strewn about almost any building in the course of construction, replacing the former empty beer bottles, proves that milk dealers are doing a rushing business. Motion picture houses are better patronized because the father takes his family to the movies, where once he spent the evening in a saloon. Bond brokers attribute to prohibition part of the increase in the number of buyers of small bonds, and bankers credit to the same source the increase in savings accounts.

STUDIES IN GOVERNMENT

DEBORAH KNOX LIVINGSTON, National Director of Christian Citizenship

VI. THE MAKING OF LAWS

The making of laws by the Congress of the United States is one of the most involved and complicated processes of Government machinery. Thousands of bills are introduced at every session of Congress, but only a few become laws. It is estimated that less than one-fiftieth of the bills introduced are ever enacted into law.

Each branch of Congress has equal authority to originate legislation, with the one exception that the Constitution gives to the House the exclusive right to originate revenue measures.

The process through which a bill passes before it becomes a law may for convenience be considered under the following heads:

Introduction of Bill

A bill may be introduced by a member of either House. It is then referred to the proper committee for consideration.

If introduced in the House of Representatives, it is placed in a receptacle called the "hopper," from which it is taken by a clerk and filed.

If introduced in the Senate, its title only is read when it is offered.

Every law must be approved by both Senate and House.

The Bill in Committee

It is absolutely necessary that all proposed legislation shall be thoroughly investigated, in order that only worthwhile measures may be brought to the attention of Congress. The work of investigation and consideration of proposed legislation is done by the committees.

Those interested in the proposed legislation may appear before the committee to which the bill has been referred and speak in its behalf; those opposed to its passage have the same privilege of appearing before the committee and stating their objections.

If the bill is rejected by the committee, it has little chance of ever becoming a law, but if it is favorably reported, it stands a fair chance of being enacted.

A committee has the power to amend a bill.

The Bill Placed on Calendar

When a committee reports a bill favorably it is placed upon the calendar, where it waits its turn for consideration, unless the Committee on Rules (which largely determines the proceedings of the House) decides a certain time for the consideration of the bill.

In the House of Representatives, there are three calendars, the Union calendar, the Unanimous Consent calendar and the House calendar.

> No man is above the law and no man is below it; nor do we ask any man's permission when we require him to obey it. Obedience to the law is demanded as a right, not asked as a favor. We have cause, as a nation, to be thankful for the steps that have been so successfully taken to put these principles into effect.
> —Theodore Roosevelt.

In the Senate there are three ways in which matters are brought before it, by unanimous consent, by making it a special order (this requires a two-thirds vote), and by taking it up in regular course in the calendar.

The Bill Before the House

When the Committee on Rules sets the day for the consideration of a bill, or it comes in due course on the calendar, the House goes into Committee of the Whole. The Speaker appoints a chairman, usually a member of the majority, to preside. The bill is then read by sections and clauses and general debate begins; any member may offer amendments to the bill. The bill may thus be debated for days, or passed in a short period of time. When the Committee of the Whole is ready to report the bill with such amendments as have been decided upon and with the recommendation that the House pass it, the committee then rises, the Speaker resumes the chair, and the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole reports the recommendation of the Committee. The bill is then voted upon by the House and ordered engrossed. It is then read for the third time, by title, and passed.

The Bill In The Senate

The bill is then sent to the Senate, where again it is referred to a committee, and where much the same procedure is followed as in the House. If the bill passes the Senate and the House, it is signed by the Speaker of the House, the Vice-President, who is president of the Senate, then by the President. The signature of the President makes the bill a law.

Congress is notified that the bill has been approved and the original copy of the act is deposited in the Department of State.

Physicians' Permits in 1921

Martha M. Allen
Superintendent of Medical Temperance for the National W. C. T. U., Forest Hills, L. I., New York

More physicians took out permits in 1921 than in 1920, I regret to report. In 1920 there were 33,379 physicians' permits issued, and in 1921, 40,806. In 1920 there were no permits in Montana and Florida, but the law was changed in Montana to allow the sale of whisky as medicine and 200 permits were issued, with a total of 620 physicians in the state. Florida in 1921 issued 38 permits with a total of 1,281 physicians.

It is most interesting to note that in the states that were dry before national prohibition came into effect only nine per cent of physicians hold permits. This is explained to some extent by the fact that 22 of these states have laws forbidding the sale or prescription of liquor as medicine. All the states that were dry prior to 1917 are without permits except Colorado, Iowa, and Virginia. The states going dry after 1916 which now forbid the sale of liquor as medicine are Nebraska, Utah, Indiana, Nevada, and New Mexico.

Considering all the agitation for change of state laws to allow the prescription of whisky and wine, and all the agitation for medicinal beer, together with the advertised possibilities of money-making through whisky prescriptions, it is greatly to the credit of the medical profession as a whole that only six per cent more physicians took out permits in 1921 than in 1920.

The percentage in 1921 is 28 holding permits, 72 not holding permits.

When the returns from the American Medical Association's questionnaire, sent to 54,000 physicians are all in and tabulated, it will probably be seen that the great majority of American physicians do not regard alcoholic liquors as necessary medicinal agents.

For the figures I have used I am indebted to the new map made by Mr. Prettyman, the Anti-Saloon League superintendent of Wilmington, Delaware, and to the Federal prohibition directors in different states.

Sir Gilbert Parker on Prohibition In America

"American prohibition does not always prohibit—and yet, judging from my recent personal observations while in the United States, it is doing great good."

With these words as an introduction Sir Gilbert Parker narrates incidents occurring during his recent visit to the United States, as reported in the newspapers. He frankly states that he is against prohibition, speaks of the faulty enforcement of the law, and yet—he is compelled to admit that prohibition has been productive of good. We quote herewith a few sentences:

"But in spite of my opposition to prohibition, I think really the United States has immensely profited by even the prohibition you have got. I dined with a member of the present Harding cabinet whose name is at least well known in England and all Europe. He said to me:

" 'When prohibition was introduced in the United States, the owners of the large factories found their workmen restless and discontented. They brought in the films—not only films of a general amusing character, but films connected with their own particular lines of business.

" 'What was the result? The men lost their discontent. Men drink, as a rule, for entertainment. They have found a new entertainment in the film and become better workmen through the agency of the film. That condition now exists, I believe, in most places in America.'

"Another example. I was out in Arizona when it was being turned from a territory into a state. You got what you wanted to drink out there then. A year later the state went dry, this long before the nation did.

"I went out there again in 1917 and the shopkeepers told me the workingmen generally had more money to spend and spent it for better things as a result of prohibition."

WHAT THE GOVERNORS HAVE TO SAY ON PROHIBITION

"HOW HAS PROHIBITION AFFECTED YOUR STATE? DO YOU CONSIDER THAT IT WILL BE A PERMANENT POLICY? WHAT ATTITUDE SHOULD THE AMERICAN PEOPLE HAVE TOWARD IT?" THESE QUESTIONS WERE RECENTLY ASKED OF THE CHIEF EXECUTIVES OF OUR COMMONWEALTHS AND EXTRACTS FROM SOME OF THE REPLIES RECEIVED ARE HERE GIVEN

Crime Not Increased By Prohibition

Columbus, Ohio

There is abundant evidence that the right-thinking people of Ohio—irrespective of their prior views on the subject of prohibition before it became the law—today are uniformly in favor of its thorough-going enforcement. The state of Ohio is exerting every effort to perform the will of the people and make prohibition fully effective.

There is no doubtful quality in the public's attitude on the saloon. They are done with it and in my opinion, nothing could induce them to return to the conditions to which prohibition put an end.

It is bound, of course, to be a matter of some time before it will be wholly impossible for anybody to obtain intoxicants. Ceaseless and conscientious vigilance and activity by public officials in charge of the enforcement of law, will, however, hasten the day that is certain to come, when it will be as difficult to get liquor as it is now to obtain narcotics.

A view sometimes heard that crime has been increased by prohibition, is erroneous in my opinion. Crime condition that may be connected with the problem must be charged to inadequate law enforcement. If there had been strict enforcement of prohibition, making it impossible for anyone to secure intoxicants, there might be some justice in charging the crime situation to prohibition. But it can have no fair test until liquor is made unobtainable. No one would think of judging the value of any other law until it has been rigidly enforced. It should be the purpose of all to hasten that time with respect to prohibition as much as possible.

It must become the policy of public officials to bring about a general realization that traffic in intoxicants is as grave an offense as traffic in any other commodity that is under the ban of the law.

Governor of Ohio

Impossible to Over-Estimate Value of Prohibition

Dover, Del.

In my opinion it is difficult to overestimate the value of national prohibition to our people in Delaware. Certainly conditions are much better under national and state prohibition laws.

WILLIAM D. DENNEY
Governor of Delaware

Must Perfect Agencies of Enforcement

Little Rock, Ark.

As governor of Arkansas, I am very keenly aware of the necessity for keeping alive the sentiment for prohibition, and am in favor of perfecting and improving our processes and agencies of enforcement, state and Federal. It is true that there are many violations of our prohibition laws, in Arkansas, but no thinking man or woman who has been identified with the fight for prohibition will say that conditions are as bad as they were when the open saloon existed here. As a matter of fact, the bulwark of public approval of prohibition is constituted of the noble womanhood of the nation. Sheriffs and other officers in this state tell us that the women are rendering great aid in breaking up illicit manufacture of whisky, and traffic in it. Violations were general at one time, but this is perceptibly changed now. Let nobody weaken in this great cause.

THOMAS C. MCRAE
Governor of Arkansas

Prohibition a Permanent Policy

Concord, N. H.

I am glad to say that prohibition is successful in the state of New Hampshire because it has closed all the saloons and some of the jails; has lessened crime and poverty; has made good, industrious citizens out of loafers and drunkards; and has removed temptation from our boys and girls. It should be, and will be, the permanent policy of state and nation, and should, and will, receive the support of every good citizen, including, of course, the women of the country who have been from the beginning the strongest single force in opposition to the liquor evil.

ALBERT O. BROWN
Governor of New Hampshire

A Deterrent in the Right Direction

Salt Lake City, Utah

Prohibition has been successful in Utah to the extent that it has eliminated the saloon and attendant evils. While it has not completely prohibited, it has been a deterrent in the right direction. It has improved business conditions, bettered the wage earner, and brought about more favorable moral conditions in general.

Of course, there are many who, through indifference, violate the law. As one American citizen who believes in upholding the Constitution I have faith that it will not undermine the allegiance of the American people to their fundamental law.

CHARLES R. MABEY
Governor of Utah

Overwhelming Approval of Prohibition

Augusta, Me.

The state of Maine for sixty years has stood loyally for prohibition. It has endured the abuse and been tempted by the gold of the liquor interests of the nation. It has, however, remained unshaken in its faith, and today stands before the world justified by the action of its sister states in adopting national prohibition. Those within the state who in the past sought to betray it, are now discredited and are heard from no more.

The men of Maine remain true to this great cause and the women give to it their overwhelming approval. I believe the day is close at hand when our whole nation will be as firm in the faith as is Maine, the pioneer prohibition state.

PERCIVAL P. BAXTER
Governor of Maine

Public Conscience Awake

Salem, Ore.

I can see nothing but permanency for the movement which has wiped out the menace of the saloon. Regardless of the fact that prohibition has not yet stopped the sale of liquor, nevertheless it has proven itself an economic benefit in many more ways than one.

Our old world is on an upward swing, all pessimists to the contrary. Crime waves, sociological disorders, and similar fermentations may come and go, but behind them all is the steady sweep toward better and higher things. Great moral movements never have been accomplished over night. They have been washed up out of oceans of blood and tears. Discouragements, dissatisfactions, difficulties, trials and tribulations have harassed them, but in the end they are accepted as part of the normal atmosphere, and the only atmosphere in which man may survive and still be happy.

The public conscience is awakened to these things, and no foeman may be so powerful as to finally overcome an aroused, and just, public conscience.

BEN W. OLCOTT
Governor of Oregon

Co-Operate in Promotion of World Prohibition

Jackson, Miss.

I regard the nation-wide prohibition law as the greatest step in law enforcement in the history of this nation. Many years ago, we had state-wide prohibition in Mississippi. A very large majority favored such a law years before this great question attracted the entire people to the extent that it was crystallized into national law. Therefore, prohibition has been a fixed policy of the state for a long while. It will always be so with us.

Nation-wide prohibition lessened our court expenses about eighty per cent up until the after-results following the war. In this reconstruction period, crime has been rampant all over the country and we have had some little trouble in the enforcement of the prohibition law. A very large majority of our entire citizenship will not only stand for state-wide prohibition always but for nation-wide prohibition and will lend every co-operation to extend this most wholesome law to all the people of the earth. Our leading men and women believe that the awful curse of liquor should be driven off the earth. There is no middle ground and absolutely no excuse for this terrible poison that has caused more sorrow than any other thing since the world began.

Our people hope and pray that the entire world may be sober for once, and when once sober it will remain so. What we need is to have the courts and all law enforcing officers diligent and courageous in the handling of this important question to the end that all law breakers along this line shall be placed either in jail, or better still, in the penitentiary. You may be assured that the people of Mississippi will do what they can to aid this great movement.

LEE M. RUSSELL
Governor of Mississippi

HOW THE MEMBERS OF THE WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION CAN CO-OPERATE WITH THE PROHIBITION DIRECTORS

Lexington, Ky.

I hold to the opinion, formed after many years of experience and observation, and much thought on the subject, that law enforcement is very largely in the hands of the public, and that the people, or at least too many of them, rely too much upon the officials for enforcement of our criminal and penal laws, and consider themselves under no obligations whatever to assist in the work. It is my opinion that the people should take the lead, and always head the procession, and I say procession advisedly, because to effect the successful enforcement of law throughout the republic, there must be a universal, trans-continental procession of men and women with hearts aflame with love and respect for law, spurred on by an earnest desire to make the world better, ready and anxious to organize for the battle with crime, and to face lawlessness in the open and fight it out. The people should realize that in this business of law enforcement, they have something more to do than to elect the officials. Just as soon as these men are sworn, the people should rally like a militant army behind them and stay behind them until the job is finished. It is true the officer is a necessary agent in law enforcement, but the officers without the co-operation of the people are as powerless as the motor without gas.

This is so well understood that it requires no further mention from me. The women have always been powerful factors in creating public sentiment along all lines, and especially in the direction of enforcing the law. They have always been strong advocates of law and order. Very few of them have ever shown any sympathy with the lawless, and now that the ballot is theirs, by virtue of long years of ceaseless struggle and toil, they will doubtless show a keener interest in the affairs of their country and in the cause of good government.

Women are more tireless than men. They never give up, and to fail in any project or undertaking is to them little less than disgrace. The law-breaker has in woman a foe, both vigilant and uncompromising, and the fact that the women are so constituted means that they can, and will, be a source of great strength in bringing order out of chaos, and suppressing crime throughout the world. In many ways, they give assistance along this line when in reality the work put forth at the time is not especially intended for that purpose. For instance, the W. C. T. U. is a powerful organization of temperance women dedicated primarily to the work of curtailing the influence of liquor, and the liquor interests, through legislative enactment, but the effort put forth by this splendid body of loyal workers has had a vast bearing and influence upon the matter of the enforcement of the prohibitory laws in America. The fight upon liquor is a fight, whether made under one heading or another; whether by the W. C. T. U., before the legislature or by officials in the courts at the bar of justice.

The women are always to the front in church and Sunday school work, and are a force behind all kindred movements; all civic organizations for human betterment have the loyal and courageous backing of women everywhere. Where these are plentiful and their influence has been felt in the community, law and order are supreme. This has been abundantly proven by statistics gathered from all quarters of the globe.

Sam Collins,
Federal Prohibition Director.

Hartford, Conn.

I wish to thank the Woman's Christian Temperance Union for the interest it is taking in the enforcement of the prohibition law. Anything it undertakes will, I am sure, be of immense value. The women of America have a splendid opportunity at this time to do things in a definite way and they never yet have failed in any good work in which they have engaged.

It looks to me as if we were on the road to greater things along law enforcement lines, especially in the state of Connecticut, where we are pretty well established. It is our aim to have connected with us only those who are in sympathy with the work, and thus far I am very well satisfied with the new state of affairs. We have a body of men who are trying the best that they can to enforce the Federal law.

One of the principal things to do is to keep constantly before the people the vital fact that the laws of the land should be enforced and I find that general opinion is along that line.

James. W. Hague, for the Federal Prohibition Director,
Harry E. MacKenzie.

The Pretense That Prohibition Does Not Prohibit

While the statement is frequently made that we have under prohibition more drunkenness than we had during the wet regime, there seems to be in leading periodicals and in the daily press, in some of the papers even that were formerly frankly antagonistic to the cause, an abundance of testimony to the contrary.

"There are many logical arguments against sumptuary legislation of any kind," says the New York Morning Telegraph, "but the pretense that prohibition has not reduced the consumption of liquors is not logical for the reason that it is pretense, nothing more. There has been a tremendous slump in drunkenness, even here in the largest city in the country, where the population is largely foreign and where the prohibition law probably is opposed by a majority..... We refuse to close our eyes to facts, simply because we did not, prior to the adoption of the Eighteenth Amendment, train with advocates of sumptuary law."

The Fort Smith (Ark.) American states its conviction that whatever opinions one may hold as to the present and future status of prohibition, "no one in this nation with a modicum of sense and information will deny the hundred per cent value of an expression by the head of the Salvation Army. Because this is universally conceded, the article by General Booth in a recent number of the War Cry, is especially noteworthy. She said in part:

"'In New York City, year by year we have celebrated Thanksgiving Day from six in the morning collecting the drunks from park benches, feeding them and sobering them up. But last year they were not there, and we gave the day to the poorest children in the city.'

"According to the General, the secretaries report that drunkenness among the men frequenting the Army hotels and industrial homes has almost disappeared. Men who formerly could hardly support themselves now have savings accounts."

Recently the Portland (Oregon) Telegram printed the following:

"There is not a large city or state in the Union where drunkenness, poverty and crime resulting from drunkenness have not decreased under prohibition. For example, St. Louis reduced its cases of drunkenness from 2,605 in 1919 to 691 in 1920; Minneapolis from 6,089 to 1,550; New York City from 14,182 in 1917 to 5,813 in 1920; Connecticut from 3,777 in 1919 to 943 in 1920; Massachusetts from 77,295 in 1919 to 32,580 in 1920."

Edgar White, in an article in the Christian Advocate, gives a very interesting sketch of Judge V. L. Drain, of Shelbyville, Mo., an ardent advocate of temperance who believes that prohibition is being made to prohibit. In charging the Macon county grand jury for the September term of the circuit court, the judge said:

"Gentlemen, I was prosecuting attorney of Shelby County the year local option was adopted there over twenty years ago. They laughed and told us that men would make liquor as long as men would drink it, law or no law. We closed up the saloons, but alleged drug stores were started in nearly all the towns and villages—places with a few bottles of medicine in front and several barrels of whisky in the rear. They mocked and said we could not stop them. But we put in vigilant officers, the fake druggists were arrested, and the fines were so heavy they had to quit a business they found unprofitable. Since then we have had gatherings in our towns attended by five thousand people and more, and not one arrest for drunkenness. We have grown men and women in our county who do not know what a saloon looks like. We have children who have never seen a drunken man.

"One man here, known as the 'bad collector,' made a living by charging merchants stiff prices for collecting accounts from men who drank. He was a persistent fellow, following the debtors to their homes, their working places, and meeting them on the streets. They had to pay to get rid of him. But the merchants could not collect a cent from such customers. With prohibition this collector's business stopped. The former drinkers paid cash, and were relieved of duns.

"A Bevier woman used to put up grape juice in half-pint whisky bottles her husband would find along the road between Macon and Bevier. There was never any trouble to find bottles until the saloons were shut down. Then there were no more bottles on the roadside and the lady had to depend on other sources to get containers for her grape juice.

"There are now happy homes where there used to be squalor and misery. New cottages are being built in town and country and old ones repaired. The family drives to church in an auto, for now the mother and girls have clothes they are not ashamed to wear. In one of the local banks here a time savings department was opened less than three months ago, and now it has over $28,000 in deposits by working men."

WHO SAYS PROHIBITION DOES NOT PROHIBIT?

II. RESULTS OF PROHIBITION UPON HOMES

Cora F. Stoddard, National W. C. T. U. Director

The sanctity of the home was so esteemed by the first Congress of the United States that at its first session specific provision was made to protect the home against unreasonable invasion. This was embodied in the Fourth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, upon which opponents of prohibition, ignoring the word "unreasonable," relied to block necessary legislation for the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment.

Prohibition, by abolishing an agent which ruthlessly invades and destroys, has restored comfort and serenity to thousands of homes that were being broken up by drinking fathers. A survey of the results in one city, Boston, Massachusetts,* brought out enough cases of rehabilitated homes to silence those who are trying to belittle the effects of the law. The following are a few of the most striking:

A Boston city missionary tells of one family consisting of father and mother and five children in which, before prohibition, the man was seldom sober and the children so afraid of him that the mother used to put them to bed before he came home. One winter night at eleven o'clock, the missionary found the father dead drunk on the kitchen floor and the mother sitting outside on the stairs in the hall with the little three-weeks old baby in her arms, not daring to go in because he had threatened all day to kill her if he had the chance. Today the father works steadily, provides for his family as a father should, and happiness is written on the faces of the mother and the children.

In 1916, one woman, wife of a coal teamster, driven to desperation by her hard conditions of life, threw herself into the river, but was rescued. In 1920 a visitor who had known the family but who had lost track of them for a few months, traced them from the squalid street where they had dwelt for years to an excellent neighborhood. The father was working steadily. The home, formerly bare and untidy, was well-kept and attractive, with new furniture, a phonograph and a telephone. "The greatest change of all was in the woman's face. She seemed to have dropped ten years."

In 32 families in one Boston district there were 39 men and 4 women victims of drink. Now the wives and mothers in these homes no longer go out to work, and many of them send their laundry to the "wet wash." The change in the character of the men seems almost incredible. Former brutes have become self-respecting men interested in the welfare of their wives and children. A grandfather, a habitual drinker, now says, "Just see where I am, working all my life, yet only a florist's helper, never saved a cent. Since whisky went I have bought a cottage on the Cape in a few months."

"Our social workers are unanimous in stating that their experiences with patients and families show that the difficulties formerly met with occasioned by intemperance and alcoholism, have almost entirely disappeared," writes Mr. Wing, director of the Boston Dispensary. "There is a marked improvement in the condition of parents of the children who come to us, and our nurses, in their follow-up work in the homes of the poor, report a family life of far different atmosphere, with the absence of the former depressed and discouraged state of mind on the part of mothers," reports Mr. G. Loring Briggs, manager of the Boston Floating Hospital.

The following story is credited to Miss Mary Beard, president of the national organization for Public Health Nursing: "A year ago we received a call to visit a family in which we found three children ill with measles. The home, children and mother were in a destitute condition, no bedding, little food, and the usual lack of necessities that are to be noted where intemperance rules. The man was, to all appearances, a confirmed drunkard, seeming not to care that his children had no food, and conditions grew worse as time went on. Then prohibition came and the seemingly impossible happened. The man went to work and kept at work. After a time he suggested that they move to a better location, as he did not think that his neighbors were very nice. Now wife and children are much better clothed; new furniture has been bought, and the entire family standards are changed."

"In ten years, with eight children to carry around in my arms," one woman told Miss Beard, "I have never been able to buy a baby carriage. Now, thanks to prohibition, I have a baby carriage instead of Jack hanging around at the corner saloon."

"The women in these homes that we know, who in the past have borne the brunt of the hardships," says Mr. William H. Pear, general agent of the Boston Provident Association, "are almost unanimously in favor of the changed condition. There are only three out of the 26 we have studied who protest against the new order. One woman, mother of six children, says: 'I thank God for prohibition, for it has given me a home; and Johnnie is going to high school instead of to work. If you'd told me this a year ago I wouldn't have believed it.'"

From a court for juvenile delinquents it was reported that boys who have been bunking out and refusing to stay at home have ceased to be active problems, due to the favorable change in the home conditions. In a number of neglect cases where drunkenness was the primary cause of failure in the family life, there has been an entire change, so that some of the children have been returned to their parents.

There has been a marked decrease in the number of cases of petty delinquency in congested tenement districts. A definite and larger number of homes is known to us in which children were formerly neglected or delinquent, and which have been re-established since prohibition with altogether higher standards of living and better parental care.

In one of the cities of Massachusetts which had been "wet" a large part of twenty years, 10 families were reported in July, 1916, in which there were 29 neglected children, 7 drinking men and 7 drinking women. In 1920 there was but one family with one child neglected and one drinking man.

PROHIBITION AND MOUNTAIN SCENERY

Within the past months we have heard much concerning the change prohibition has caused in our cities, how slums have become prosperous resident districts, property values have increased, tumbledown buildings have given place to stores and homes that are ornaments to the community, and how in other ways whole towns have felt the gain.

But to many of us the idea that prohibition should affect mountain scenery is new. Nevertheless, according to a correspondent for the Christian Science Monitor, since both government and illicit distilleries have been ousted from the mountain sides of North Carolina, that part of the country, which has frequently been termed the Switzerland of the southeastern states, is, in the beauty of its scenery, far more truly representative of the other Switzerland than ever before, and the people of the south, when the warm summer months come, can now take their families to this section without fear of exposing them to contact with conditions which once made an eyesore of that which should be only "a thing of beauty and a joy forever."

"It is not commonly realized," says the correspondent, "that the government distilleries were more numerous and had a larger output than the illicit establishments. Tourists through the mountains today will pass an old abandoned government distillery every few miles in any of the corn valleys of the mountain section. The government distilleries were debauching in the last degree in their influence upon the mountain people. They not only lent a sort of respectability to employment in the business but also created the impression that the still was the farmer's friend, because it afforded him a convenient market for his corn, and it encouraged the drinking habit in the communities in which the establishments were located.

"The advent of national prohibition lent all the force derivable from loyalty to the central government among the mountaineers to the other motives for reformation. The traffic being under the ban of both state and nation, neither Democrat nor Republican could find any excuse for participation in it, and the illegal traffic became confined strictly to the lawless element.

"With a vehemence characteristic of the population many of those who were formerly engaged in the legal traffic denounced the moonshiners, and at the present time are engaged in a veritable crusade against them. 'Law and order leagues' are being organized, directed almost exclusively against the illegal liquor traffic. Religious revivals are being held with the avowed purpose of endeavoring to convert the still recalcitrant members of the community, with the result that it is harder to get a drink of liquor in western North Carolina now than ever before in the history of that region.

"One of the happiest effects of the complete outlawry of liquor in the mountains has been the rapidity with which summer resort camps for boys and girls are being developed, now that the mountain communities are free from the once almost universal plague."

Show a Service Star!

In THE UNION SIGNAL of December 22, it was suggested that we celebrate the new year by the inauguration of a "service star" campaign to secure the placing in homes of a placard of blue ground and white star, signifying total abstinence from the use of liquor and high regard for the observance of law.

On our cover page of this issue will be seen a sample of this "service star," which may be obtained from the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House. It is proposed that each local union send for it in quantities for immediate distribution. (See page ten for price.) Federal Prohibition Commissioner Roy A. Haynes has said that "the people of the United States must not lose their vision of the sanctity and majesty of the law." As a patriotic duty, let us see that this new "service star" shines in the window of every home and every place of business, a silent reminder to talk, sing, pray and work for law enforcement.

"Serve America
"Support the Constitution."

January 16, 1922—A Glorious Red Letter Day

In a little more than a week from the time of the receipt of this paper, the nation will be celebrating the victory over the drink traffic. January 16 should be made one of the Red Letter days of the year, not only because it is the historic date when we finally triumphed over the rum fiend, but because the proper observance of the day in any community will help greatly to insure proper regard for the Eighteenth Amendment, written into the Constitution at the wish of the American people, and for the observance and enforcement of all law.

ARE YOU READY TO PROPERLY OBSERVE THE OCCASION?

A Suggestion For the Y. P. B.

The social worker was in the office of the chief of police. In the course of the conversation she spoke of some disturbances that recently had occurred:

"The other night," she said, "when I was on my way home, the door of that restaurant on E.... street was thrown open, and ten or twelve well-dressed youths dashed out in a very hilarious mood, climbed into an automobile standing at the curb, and with shouts of laughter went off at high speed. I was near enough to hear some things they said, and would be willing to take my oath that they had been drinking, even in this prohibition town. The way they drove that car was perilous not only to the life and limb of any unwary street-crosser, but also to themselves. Will you have that restaurant closed?"

The chief hesitated, then he replied, "If you will give me the name of the place I will have it watched, and if there is sufficient evidence, it shall be raided. But to keep the young folks straight in this town, I need the sort of help I fear I shall not have."

"What is the difficulty?" asked his caller.

"Simply this: I can't get enough cooperation along the line of law enforcement. Too many people, nowadays, seem to think laws are made just to be broken, and so, unconsciously, many young folks are being trained as gangsters, gunmen, and criminals of the deepest dye. And is it right that I should be expected to arrest the Italian owner of that restaurant for violation of one law, when the boys coming from some of the wealthiest homes in this city violate almost every ordinance? Not only so, but their fathers set them an example by violating the speed laws and winking when they open a bottle of moonshine bought from a bootlegger. Even the mothers are not guiltless in the matter of some of the 'minor' regulations. How can you expect children to obey the laws of the land when they are not shown the necessity of obeying the regulations of home, school, and town?"

His listener nodded assent. A friend had just been telling her of a college girl who had said,

"I'm going to see the play tonight."

"But isn't this a night when you are not allowed out?"

The girl had tossed her head at the question and replied, "Oh, that's what they tell us, but we don't always obey. I shan't stick to those old rules unless I want to."

"And she is one of the really good girls, too," the friend had added in narrating the incident.

If the laws against stealing, murder, arson, and smuggling are broken—laws made for the protection of society and as a deterrent against the recurrence of crime—we expect the government to see that a penalty is meted out to the offenders. What of the laws which we call less important? Do we ourselves observe the traffic laws, take as good care of public property as of our own, keep all the town ordinances, and the like?

Should not the Y. P. B.'s and other societies stress "law observance campaigns"? Why not hold a meeting on the subject? Let each one present mention some law or ruling or city ordinance, or school or home regulation which is often disregarded. Speeding is only one example. There are innumerable other subjects which will readily occur to anyone. The leader might have all repeat Lincoln's words on reverence for law, and pass round a pledge whereby the signers would promise cheerfully to obey the laws of home, school, state, and nation, and to endeavor to promote reverence for law among all with whom they come in contact.

Co-Operative Plan for Congressional Campaigns for 1922 to be Agreed Upon

In accordance with action taken by the official board of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, representatives of the Anti-Saloon League of America and the National W. C. T. U. recently conferred in Washington. In reply to a question from the National W. C. T. U. general officers as to whether or not it is the policy of the Anti-Saloon League of America to have a Woman's Department, the Anti-Saloon League, through its general officers, replied: "The Anti-Saloon League of America has not organized and does not contemplate a special Woman's Department, nor has the national organization in any sense recommended such a policy to the state leagues. The officers of the Anti-Saloon League of America have not encouraged and are not encouraging the policy of the organization of a special Woman's Department in any of the several state leagues, and we can see no reason why the present attitude of the National League on this point should be changed. It is the unquestioned policy of the Anti-Saloon League of America to co-operate in every way possible with the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and there is no disposition to duplicate the work which the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is doing so successfully."

As an outcome of this conversation, a committee was appointed to suggest a co-operative plan for the Congressional campaigns of 1922, its report follows:

"It is recommended that in the initiation of plans for Congressional campaigns of 1922, there shall first be a conference between the major dry organizations of America, the Anti-Saloon League and the W. C. T. U. That a conference shall be held between the state officers of the A. S. L. and the state officers of the W. C. T. U. That when a definite policy for the nomination and election of dry candidates is agreed upon, these organizations shall co-operate in carrying it out, each organization working through its own channels in harmony with its legislative representative at Washington.

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awak'ning continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

These all continued with one accord in prayer and supplication. Acts 1. 14.

I have heard it said that if God would only raise up a few of the worthies of old then we could shake America. Brethren, if Christians would learn how to pray, we could not only shake America, but China, Japan, India, and Africa, and every land, and heaven would ring with the hallelujahs of the angels over repentant sinners. Pentecost can be repeated when we get the one hundred and twenty disciples, if that is all there are around, to repeat what preceded Pentecost.—R. A. Torrey.

"As Others See Us"

Under the above caption The Washington Newspaper, a magazine "dedicated to the study and improvement of journalism in Washington," presents a timely discussion of the press, by Mrs. W. S. Griswold, president of the Washington State League of Women Voters, and chairman of the industrial and social conditions department of the State Federation of Women's Clubs.

Mrs. Griswold opens the discussion with the statement that "We want a more independent press, one that will dare print the truth, even about its opponents," but in the interest of justice and fairness adds that "newspapers do much splendid work, deserving our just and generous commendation; yet there are criticisms to be made and fair criticisms should always be welcome."

"I still recall the horror," says Mrs. Griswold, "with which I discovered some ten years ago the story of a prize fight and the picture of the winner on the first page of one of our great dailies, while in the same issue, on an inside page, was the photograph of one of the judges of the supreme court of the United States who had just died. Too often this is just an illustration of the relative importance of news in the estimation of certain newspapers. Women long for the day when the newspaper will be obsessed, not with getting 'scoops', but with a desire to take the place it should hold in the confidence of the people. We long for less propaganda and more news.

"Much space is devoted to the offenses against the prohibition law, so much that the average reader wonders if it is not mere propaganda, to make all efforts toward nation-wide enforcement appear ridiculous and impossible. Could things but be reversed, the poor old sinning world would gain. Were reports made as to the good the law has accomplished in homes saved, children better nourished, increased bank deposits, greater school attendance, happier condition of wives, this would be constructive news. Thinking women regard it as most important to know what teachers, nurses, and physicians think about the effect of prohibition on the home of the working man and on the vigor of the race, what our judges and social workers find in regard to penal institutions, and what recommendations they would suggest for the reform of these institutions. We need to know both viewpoints in a labor controversy, since there is justice on both sides, and we are interested in getting every point of view.

"It is very evident that people are losing confidence in the press, and that it is very deplorable in the minds of the people that the press is held in thrall by political machines and other powers, and that only certain news delectable to these powers shall be published.

Salvation Lies in Service.

"All the large organizations of women long to see the big constructive movements emphasized. We want to hear more from the people who are doing the real work of the world, who are serving mankind. We want news still to be news, not propaganda, whether favorable or not to a certain group. In short, we want a more independent press, that will dare to print the truth, even about its opponents. Surely the day is coming when no other paper will succeed, because none other will have the confidence of the people. To be controlled by any group is a moral and spiritual slavery that in the end spells disaster."

And there is a tremendous following awaiting the newspaper that will not only publish clean, live "news" but maintain a standard of righteousness, justice and square dealing for all, and, regardless of favor, champion the principles that make for the welfare of all and the stability of government.

The Law Enforcement Manual

We wish again to call attention to the new Law Enforcement Manual, which contains information concerning the high points of the National Prohibition Enforcement Law, and practical suggestions as to ways by which members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and others may aid in law enforcement and law observance. Thy Kingdom Come

Where selfish nations grasp the sword,
Where cannon keeps the spoil that's won;
We lift Thy cross, we pray our Lord
Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done.

Where parliaments enact the laws,
May statesmen hear thy voice, O Son;
And live Thy prayer in human cause,
Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done.

Amid the market, bank and trade,
May merchant prince with fortune won,
Observe the law how wealth is made,
Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done.

Amid the spindle and the wheel,
Where little children sweat and run,
And industry grinds down the heel.
Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done.

Where capital lifts up its might,
And crushes down the toiling son,
Great Prince of Peace, "Let there be light,"
Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done.

Where statesmen gaze across the board,
May they forget the victory won,
And plows replace the reeking sword,
Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done.

If Christ can have His right of way,
In people's prince and toiling son,
Earth's night shall pass to heaven's day,
Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done.

Survival of Civilization Depends Upon Education

Helen G. H. Estelle, National Superintendent Anti-Narcotics

The schools of the country are the foundations of the nation's integrity. Treaties of peace may be written, laws made, and regulations formulated, but they will survive only as they are graven on the hearts of the people. This will come only through a general education that makes for mutual understanding and concord.

About a decade ago—just about the time that many states were passing prohibition laws—public attention was drawn to the spread of the narcotic drug evil. To some, the use of drugs was considered the logical result of curtailing the liquor traffic, but the truth was that the drug evil, promoted by those having a desire for financial profit, had been spreading unobserved until finally the evil results began to be apparent.

The trend of opinions and data received from many public officials in many states is that prohibition has not increased the use of drugs, and that where there seems to be an increase, it is due to active enforcement of anti-narcotic laws and regulations. In some states, laws which compel all addicts to register, if they are to purchase drugs, have recently been passed.

Drug addicts are comparatively youthful. Justice Collins points out that in New York City "between the ages of seventeen and twenty-two, there are such a large number of heroin victims that the average age may be fixed at twenty-one. It strikes youth particularly." A large majority of the patients at the New York Health department clinic "are under twenty-five and nearly one-third of them are not out of their teens." "It is easily understood," says the Health department bulletin indicating this fact "what a large share idleness and bad companions have in starting the use of narcotics—often taken from a morbid desire to imitate what is considered a practice of the gunmen and gangsters." The use of tobacco by those of tender years is on the increase. The average age at which boys begin the use of cigarets has fallen to eleven years. The number who begin the habit increases. With these facts before us, we must be more vigilant in getting our educational program against cocaine, heroin, tobacco and other drugs before the young people and children. They must be taught that these drugs are poisons and that the results of their use are far reaching.

The school is a fertile field. Here we can present the facts that may help to change the conditions reported by the New York City board of health. The school was the common medium by which the truth regarding the harmfulness of alcohol was given to those in attendance, and today there is a new generation of pupils. In a few years they wil go out to shape the destiny of this country and they must know the truths regarding other destroyers of manhood and civilization.

Awards: Kansas distributed the greatest number of copies of "Nicotine", and five dollars' worth of literature goes to Mrs. Grace Prather of Winfield, Kansas. Honorable mention is made of Mrs. B. M. Osgood of Fort Dodge, Iowa, who distributed one hundred copies to the teachers.

Two original posters made by members of the Young People's Branch were of equal merit and an award of five dollars each is made to Miss Dorothy Miller, Lancaster, Pennsylvania, and to Harold MacEwen, Schuylerville, New York.

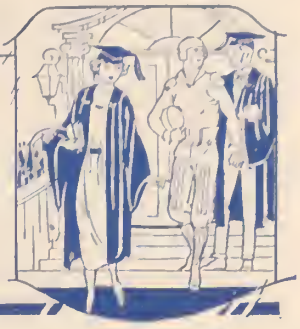
OUR YOUNG PEOPLE



NOTED ANTI-ALCOHOL CHAMPIONS

"Drink-Smoke House" of Austria's President

"I stand for the prohibition of all intoxicating beverages," said President Hainisch of the new republic of Austria, to Virgil G. Hinshaw of the Prohibition National Committee on the occasion of his recent visit. "This position is nothing new with me. My early teachings were such that I could not well do otherwise. My mother gave me three kronen each week from the time I was a small boy until I reached manhood to abstain from the use of alcohol and narcotics. I saved the money and bought a house with it and since that time I have taken my friends to that particular house and said to them,—this is my drink-smoke house."

"Moderate Drinking Is Self-Deception" Says President Masaryk of the Czecho-Slovak Republic

In a letter addressed to Prof. Irving Fisher of Yale University at the time he became the head of the Czecho-Slovak republic, President Masaryk wrote:

"I used to drink but my own experience prompted me to accept the principle of abstinence. I am healthier. I can do much more work, and in short I enjoy and use life better than I did when drinking. I do not believe in moderate drinking—that is self-deception, and I do not believe in stopping drinking gradually—stop at once, that is the only way. I wish our whole country would be dry."

Chief Executive of Chile Digs Up Vineyard

"I am not afraid to declare," said President Arturo Allesandri, chief executive of the republic of Chile, South America, in a public address, "that I will do battle with undying energy for the saving of the race against alcoholism and against the white slave traffic and the social evils which are undermining our people. When I say I will wage war against alcoholism, I start by preaching by my acts as well as with words..... As luck would have it, I became owner some years since of a hundred and twenty-five square metres of vineyards and, in consequence of my ideas, I had them all uprooted, and had walnuts planted instead..... Why cannot others do what I, a modest citizen, have done? What indeed is a statesman's duty under the circumstances? He must face the problem, not in an analytical way, but practically, by transforming the wine industries so that the vineyards will produce pure fruit juices (and not poisonous liquors) with great benefit to the people."

The Salutation of the Dawn

Listen to the exhortation of the dawn!
Look to this day!
For it is life, the very life of life.
In its brief course lie all the Varieties and realities of your existence.

The bliss of growth,
The glory of action,
The splendor of beauty:

For yesterday is but a dream,
And to-morrow is only a vision;
But to-day, well lived, makes
Every yesterday a dream of happiness,
And every to-morrow a vision of hope.
Look well therefore to this day!
Such is the salutation of the dawn.

(Versed motto from the Sanskrit.)

Why I Am a Total Abstainer

Hon. William Jennings Bryan, Ex-Secretary of State.

FIRST, because God never made a normal human brain that needed to be stimulated to action by alcohol.

SECOND, because among the countless millions of men God never created one who was strong enough to begin the use of intoxicating liquor with certainty that he would not become its victim.

THIRD, because there is no time in a human life from birth to death when it is safe to begin the use of alcohol.

If these three propositions are true—that no normal brain needs alcohol, that no man is strong enough to be sure that he will not become its victim, and that there is no time when it is safe to begin to drink—there can be no excuse for the use of alcohol.

Three Reasons for Christians to Abstain

Let me give you three arguments, which I believe to be unanswerable from the Christian standpoint:

The first is that a Christian having given himself to God and to Christ in service, has no moral right to take into his body that which will impair the value of the service he has to render, and he has no moral right to contract a habit which may not only destroy his capacity for service, but his disposition to serve.

The second is that the Christian has no money that he can spare for intoxicating liquor. There are so many noble causes that appeal to a Christian heart that I know not how a Christian can justify before his own conscience the wasting of any money on intoxicating liquor. Those in charge of home missionary work will show us that there are sections in the country where there are neither churches nor Sunday schools for lack of funds. They will show us,—those engaged in foreign missionary work—areas of the earth's surface with millions of inhabitants to whom the light of the Gospel has not yet been carried for lack of funds.

How can a Christian get down on his knees in the morning and pray to his Heavenly Father, "Thy kingdom come," and then rise up and spend for alcohol money that he could spare to hasten the coming of God's kingdom on earth!

And how can a Christian put his influence on the side of a habit that brings tens of thousands to the grave every year? All religion is propagated by example, and the Master himself says that we should so live that others, seeing our good work, may be constrained to "glorify the Father." The great Apostle said, if eating meat would make his brother to offend, he would eat no meat. It was not because he did not like meat; it was because he loved his brother better than he loved meat. And what Christian man can stand before his fellow Christians and admit that his fondness for intoxicating liquor is greater than his love of his brothers, whom he might save by setting them a good example?

"Prohibition for Uruguay by 1925," Declares President Brum

Hon. Baltasar Brum, president of the republic of Uruguay, not long ago issued an order that no alcoholic drinks should be carried on board any ship of the Navy. He has expressed his views on the alcohol question in these forceful words:

"FELLOW CITIZENS, TO PREACH AGAINST ALCOHOL BY WORD AND DEED SHOULD BE THE AIM OF ALL WHO ARE INTERESTED IN THE IMPROVEMENT OF THE HUMAN RACE."

He made a trip recently to the eastern part of Uruguay, and upon his arrival at one of the big estancios, the owner said to him, with true Spanish courtesy, "This is your house, your excellency." President Brum quickly replied, "If this is really my home during my stay I beg that you will allow me to make a suggestion. Please do not serve any alcoholic liquors."

He expresses the hope that Uruguay will be the next nation to go on the water wagon.

The W. C. T. U. Crusading for Law Enforcement

The keystone of law can only be firm and secure when it is held in place by the arch of that keystone, which is public sentiment.—Frances E. Willard.

How the Woman's Christian Temperance Union or Any Organization, or Individual, May Aid Enforcement Of the Law

Know The Law—Continue Scientific Teaching Concerning Alcohol

1. Organize classes for the study of the national, state and city enforcement laws, and the names and duties of the officials who are charged with its observance. Use this Enforcement Manual as a basis for a ten-minute quiz at each local union meeting.

2. Suggest the formation of similar classes in women's clubs, church missionary societies, and young people's organizations.

3. Hold the Scientific Temperance Instruction laws. Urge all teachers to continue scientific teaching concerning alcohol. Ask high school and college teachers to use the Enforcement Manual in their classes in civics.

Co-operation With Enforcement Officials

1. Every local union should appoint a Committee on Law Enforcement. This local committee should, as far as practicable, be composed of representatives from each voting precinct within the territorial subdivision represented by the union, or by some similar method representation from each locality should be insured.

2. The committee from the organization should wait on the prosecuting attorney or the county judge for a conference as to the best methods of co-operation.

3. The local Law Enforcement Committee should report evidence of law violations to the local officials whose duty it is to enforce the law.

4. When additional legal counsel is needed, or the co-operation of state or Federal officers, write to state enforcement headquarters, if no local attorney will advise you.

5. Call at law enforcement headquarters at least weekly to see what is needed. Keep a complete roster of all officers of law in your county. Send them helpful information, encouraging news items on law enforcement, and appreciative letters, showing your interest in their efforts.

6. The committee should report to the officers the place where liquor is sold, and any information in their possession, waiting a reasonable time before giving publicity concerning it, or filing protest against the officers.

7. Secure lists of convictions, and tabulate arrests for drunkenness and crimes, from court dockets and police departments each month or quarter, and report to state enforcement headquarters.

8. Follow up cases where sentence is suspended during good behavior, and report violations of court orders.

9. Send information to state enforcement headquarters about applications for permits and evidence of violation of law by permit-holders.

10. Notify prosecuting officers when parties are arrested for second offense, as, if the fact is proven, a more severe penalty is provided in such cases.

11. Secure names of persons on prohibitive tax list and investigate to see if local collector is using diligence to collect the tax.

12. Members of the union should be ready to serve on jury when called.

13. Information concerning law violation should be given to owners of buildings.

Attendance at Court

1. Be present at the first session of the Federal court of your district, that you may learn the attitude of the judge on the question of enforcing the Eighteenth Amendment.

2. The Law Enforcement Committee should arrange for representatives of the organization and leading citizens to attend court trials in important cases. Their presence will offset the bad influence of the wet crowds which hang around court-rooms.

Appreciation and Protest

1. Protest to moving picture managers when anything disrespectful to the Eighteenth Amendment, or the enforcement of the law, is shown in their pictures. Praise the appearance of lessons on reverence for law.

2. When public officials fail in doing their duty, a committee can often voice a dignified protest which will bring good results. It is good policy to assume the officer will do his duty and give him every chance to do it before any public protest is filed.

3. When public officials ignore their oath of office and fail to enforce the law even when they have the evidence, publish this news in the newspapers and make it widely known to the tax-paying citizens.

4. Protest in a dignified manner to a judge, or other officer, who imposes ridiculously low fines or fails in doing his duty and makes law enforcement a farce.

5. To create a greater respect for law and to secure its enforcement in localities where it is grossly violated, or where officials fail to discharge their duty, community effort is strongly advised. It is recommended that temperance organizations take the initiative in proposing that a mass meeting to determine upon a campaign that will result in law observance and law enforcement be called by men and women leaders in churches, educational institutions, business and professional life, social welfare or relief work, women's clubs, missionary societies and the existing temperance organizations, they to constitute a committee to prepare a suggestive program of activities and sponsor the community movement.

Election of Officials

1. Each state should publish, in leaflet form, its own state enforcement laws. In this booklet should be given information for voters as to election laws, registration dates, and requirements and time of holding of primaries.

2. The records of all candidates for office—municipal, state or national—should be carefully scrutinized and discussed at local union meetings. The enforcement of the law depends very largely upon the election and appointment of honest, incorruptible men and women; and voters, if they are alert at ward caucuses and primaries, and watchful for a "square deal" at the polls, can do much to control the situation. Vigilant attention should be given to candidates for election to the United States Congress.

When I visualize that mighty force of righteousness that today is contending for our Constitution, for sobriety, and for the temperance reform, there seems to rise before me the gentle figure of Mrs. Eliza Jane Trimble Thompson, known the world around as "Mother Thompson," the leader of the Crusade from which developed the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and which was essentially the foundation of all the great temperance reform movements, which have resulted in national prohibition in America.

—Federal Prohibition Commissioner Haynes.

Shall not the women of today prove themselves lineal spiritual successors to "Mother Thompson" by wholehearted consecration to the work of enforcing the law?

What Would You Say?

(Answers to these Questions Will be Given in Next Week's Paper)

1. WHAT WOULD YOU SAY if you were asked to name the three general methods prescribed by the national prohibition law for enforcing prohibition?

2. WHAT WOULD YOU SAY if you were asked what penalties are prescribed by the national law for a person who manufactures or sells liquor in violation of the law?

3. WHAT WOULD YOU SAY if you were asked what the national prohibition law has to say about the advertising of contrivances or recipes for the making of intoxicating liquors?

4. WHAT WOULD YOU SAY as to the right of any persons, injured in person or property by an intoxicated person, to recover damages as provided by the law?

5. WHAT WOULD YOU SAY if you were asked what two branches of the Federal government are charged with the enforcement of the prohibition law?

What An Organizer Heard

Ida D. Van Valkenburgh

"Oh, cut it out, Bob! Such talk makes me tired. You better keep still or you'll show your ignorance. The idea! They 'sell more booze now than before we had prohibition,' and you 'can get it so easy and so cheap'! Fellows, hear that, will you? Well, Bob, my advice to you is, just try getting some from these boot-leggers and you will find that it is not very cheap and not very safe, either, and you are apt to wake up in a jail or a hospital.

"Guess you're grouchy because you can't drive that old beer wagon any longer. You ought not to kick about that. You have a much better job, earn more money, and look much better than you did when you were riding around sitting on an old beer barrel. Say, Bob, I'll tell you what I'll do. My mother takes THE UNION SIGNAL, and I'll bring over a few copies, and if you read them, you will never say again that prohibition is a failure."

The organizer, who was in a small railroad station making inquiries concerning train connections, on hearing this part of the conversation turned and said to the young man who had just spoken: "So your mother takes THE UNION SIGNAL, does she?"

"Right you are," was the reply, "and the whole family reads it. There are several copies of that paper taken in this little burg, and because of that fact you won't hear much silly talk such as Bob has just been giving us. Guess after he reads THE SIGNAL he won't say that booze is so cheap and easy to get."

"No," said the organizer, "the last enforcement officer I talked with told me how long and hard he and his assistants had to work to get evidence against a certain law-breaker and that it cost him eighteen dollars for one glass of the stuff. Yes, booze is pretty dear at any price."

1000 Eggs In Every Hen

If You Keep Chickens, Cut This Out—Four to Seven Eggs a Week per Hen Through Cold Winter Season. With Eggs at Dollar a Dozen, Means $5.00 Profit per Hen in Next Six Months. Amazing Poultry Secrets Revealed By AMERICA'S FOREMOST POULTRY EXPERT

This is an offer no reader of this paper who keeps chickens can afford to ignore. We will tell you why.

Henry Trafford, Famous Poultry Expert and Breeder, for nearly eighteen years Editor of "Poultry Success," has developed a new and remarkable system of rearing, breeding and feeding chickens for heavy egg production that seems certain to revolutionize the poultry industry and give five eggs or more for every egg produced today. This plan or system is explained in Mr. Trafford's "1,000 Egg Hen" a free copy of which will be sent to any person who keeps six hens or more.

Poultry keepers, following Mr. Trafford's directions, learn how to start young pullets laying early; make old hens moult quickly and resume heavy laying during entire winter season. Most any hen will lay in spring when eggs are cheap. Mr. Trafford tells how hens lay four to seven eggs a week during coldest winter days when eggs sell at a dollar a dozen or more. His system shows how any breeder, with ordinary care, may get 1,000 eggs or more from nearly every hen in four to six years' time at a net profit of $25.00.

There is big money to be made with chickens this winter by the man or woman who gets the eggs. The time to get the hens ready for heavy winter laying is now. Mr. Trafford's "1,000 Egg Hen" system tells how and arrangements have been made whereby any reader of this paper may receive one copy absolutely free by using the Coupon below. Send no money, but cut out the Coupon and mail it with your name and address to Henry Trafford, 1044-F Court Bldg., Binghamton, N. The Difference

Lela Watson Walker.

A boyish snicker burst from the foot of the pine table in Grey Swamp as Governor Stanisfield in humorous vein ended his speech. A roar of laughter followed.

On rough benches, on either side, were ranged a score or more of the governor's friends and kinsmen who, in his honor, had arranged this fish fry to make the most pleasant of all the last day of his visit in his old home town.

Absolute silence had greeted the chief executive's joke until the boy mentioned, catching the point, had timidly given vent to amusement, a fact the governor took note of.

"Say, Will, I like your quickness," he said to the youth. "I saw you give Fred there beside you a dig with your elbow the minute the last word left my mouth. That means Grey Swamp can still produce brains. I've told that tale to at least forty groups of men. Not one ever found the fun in it as soon as you did."

"Tha—ank you, sir," Will Latham half laughingly responded.

"Sure! Grey Swamp grows the best, from peanuts to a governor of the state," gaily added a handsome, middle-aged man on the right of Fred Bains, the boy beside Will Latham.

"That's fine of you, Alex Bains, and here's to Grey Swamp. May her fame steadily increase," warmly replied Governor Stanisfield, lifting a cup of coffee and emptying it.

"A toast in coffee! Hold on," urged Mr. Bains, turning halfway around and calling to a negro who was bringing a platter of hot fish. "Here, Sandy, put down your dish. We'll wait on ourselves while you go after that drinkable you've got out yonder."

Sandy dived into a clump of laurel near by and returned with bottles of champagne in buckets of cracked ice. In a moment the sound of popping corks and gurgling wine ran around the table.

On the left of Will Latham sat his father, Alfred Latham. Sandy set down a bottle between them.

"A cup of coffee for me when you can bring it, if you please, Sandy," said Mr. Latham, pushing the bottle away.

"And I'll have some water," added Will, moving the champagne still further along.

"So will I," Fred Bains jauntily spoke up, giving the stuff another push.

"Why don't you show yourself a man?" in an undertone sternly rebuked Mr. Bains, leaning toward his son.

The boy's face flushed. Stealthily he reached out and drew the bottle back.

* * * * * * * * * * *

Mr. Latham sat on his spacious piazza, apparently viewing the undulating sweep dotted with prosperous homes. From the roadside in front of his beautiful place to the sea-girt wilderness in the distance, from which the village down the hill took the name of Grey Swamp, the scene bespoke plenty and happiness.

An automobile rolling along the road, which stretched away like a ribbon of dark red through the fields of green, passed out of sight. Mr. Latham sank back in his chair, smiling to himself.

An elderly man, stooped of shoulder and shabby-genteel in attire, approached from the direction of the village, opened the gate and came up the walk.

"Heigh, Alex, come in. Glad to see you," greeted Mr. Latham, rising and meeting his caller at the steps.

When both were seated, the visitor turned to Mr. Latham:

"Wasn't that Jim Stanisfield in that car with your son, Will?"

"Yes, and you should have come sooner. U. S. Senator Stanisfield is on his way to a big to-do in Georgia. He came a day ahead of time, dropped off to see Will, and Will brought him out here. They took dinner with me and hurried on that Will might pack a grip and accompany him. Jim inquired about you and bade me remember him to you."

"Thank you! Jim's a fine man—one of the very few whom success won't spoil. He still keeps friendly with Will, does he?"

"Why, yes. It's singular that Will's as chummy with him as I've always been. When Will resigned the secretary's place Jim gave him in Washington to go in business for himself, the friendship strengthened instead of abating. He never misses a chance to visit him."

"That's good. I'm proud of Will for you. All Grey Swamp is for that matter. We hear fine accounts of him in the city. Your other boys are promising, too."

"God blessed me in my children."

"And cursed me in mine," bitterly burst out the other.

"For shame, Alex Bains!" kindly reproved Mr. Latham. "Don't lay the blame on your Maker."

"Perhaps it is wicked," half-heartedly admitted Mr. Bains. "I don't envy you your good fortune—I wish you the best—but why are my boys not as good men as yours? You and I grew up with equal advantages. If anything I had the better of you. Your sons are respected and prosperous. Mine are rowdies, steadily growing worse and dragging me to the poor-house. What makes the difference?"

"You put that question to me—you of all men?" doubtingly returned Mr. Latham. "Honestly, Alex, do you expect an answer or some silly evasion?"

"The truth, if you know what it is. I can not make it out. We started out in business under similar conditions. Your wife and mine were college friends. Our children might have grown up to be at least somewhat alike—not yours all good and mine all bad. Tell me, if you can, what makes the difference?"

"For a man who has fought prohibition and advocated moderate drinking as you have to say that to one who has worked for temperance as hard as I have sounds queer, Alex," Mr. Latham pointedly remarked, then asked: "Who gave Fred his first drink?"

"How could I know he'd make a fool of himself?" touchily retorted Mr. Bains. "I'd taken my liquor all my life, as did my father before me, without stooping to intoxication. It's a man's privilege to drink if he likes, but he should stop within reason."

"Ah, Alex, therein lies a difficulty I shall not argue out with you," warmly spoke up Mr. Latham. "Do you recall that picnic we gave Jim Stanisfield during his first term as governor?"

Mr. Bains pressed his lips together, the color suffusing his face.

"I'm sure you do," conciliatingly continued Mr. Latham. "Against the wishes of the others you carried champagne there. When Sandy brought me a bottle, I refused it. Your boy, Fred, and my Will were the only youngsters present. When Sandy reached Will I turned my face. I wanted him to choose for himself, but I prayed to God that He would give him the courage to refuse. To my intense gratification my wish was granted. Fred also said 'No,' and, with marked displeasure, you bade him 'show himself a man'. That was the beginning. The difference between your boys and mine lies in the fact that my wife and I hated and feared intoxicants and instilled that in our children. You liked them, trifled with them, and taught your children that their use was all right."

"I expected sympathy from you, Alf," sensitively protested Mr. Bains. "I believed I had the right to ask it of you. I came here to request you to reason with Fred and to assist me in getting him out of the trouble he's in. Perhaps I made a mistake."

"I've heard about Fred's conduct and I do sympathize with you," ardently responded Mr. Latham, "but, honestly, old friend, you are the only person who can help Fred. Go to him like a man, Alex, and admit you started him off with your false ideas about drinking. Ask him to forgive you, and implore him not to send you to your grave with that sin on your conscience. There's a lot of good in him, and, with God's help, you can save him, and through him prevent Oscar and Paul from following in his footsteps."

"Go back on my lifelong practice? Let the whole community understand I was a stiffnecked fool in opposing your womanish notions of temperance?" indignantly blurted out Mr. Bains.

"That's your way of stating the case, not mine, keep in mind, Alex," calmly replied Mr. Latham, "but don't look for more manliness in Fred than you yourself are willing to show. I prefer to help you, but I am convinced it would be folly unless you will do your part."

Mr. Bains hastily rose, then stood irresolute, his face averted.

"Don't misunderstand me, Alex," pleadingly added Mr. Latham. "I'd love to reach out my hand and tell you I'll stand by you unconditionally. Your friends have done that until Fred takes it for granted he can commit any sinful act he chooses and you will 'pay him out.' Instead of being a help to you it is encouraging him to break the law, and I can not become a party to that."

Suddenly Mr. Bains leaned forward, and putting his hand on Mr. Latham's shoulder, said huskily:

"Alf, you're the right sort of friend. I'm going to take your advice."

Eliminate Alcohol In Every Form

The misuse of alcoholic extracts all over the country has attracted the attention of the W. C. T. U. The necessity of eliminating this evil has caused many unions to resolve to use only non-alcoholic products and to use their influence to educate all women against the use of alcoholic extracts.

Investigation of many brands by the W. C. T. U. has proven EveryDay Flavors to be the acme of food flavoring. Made in a clear liquid in a complete assortment, they are practical and convenient. The many users have learned that alcohol adds nothing to a flavoring, and they are earnest in their endeavor to exploit the merits of EveryDay Flavors. Vast good is being done in this way.

For information in regard to the misuse of alcohol in extracts and in regard to the sale of EveryDay Flavors, write the EveryDay Products Company, Inc., 110 S. Elizabeth St., Lima, Ohio.

President Warren G. Harding

William Lyon Phelps, A. M., Ph. D., professor of English language and literature, Yale University, says:

"I thoroughly believe in a university education for both men and women; but I believe a knowledge of the Bible without a college course is more valuable than a college course without the Bible.

"Every one who has a thorough knowledge of the Bible may truly be called educated; and no other learning or culture, no matter how extensive or elegant, can form a proper substitute."

And President Harding says:

"I have always believed in the inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, whereby they have become the expression to man of the Word and will of God."

The Correspondence method of Bible study is the best method for securing a thorough knowledge of the Bible—better than any oral teaching can possibly be. More than 7,000 persons of 40 different occupations are now enrolled in one or more of the

Florida Plans For Coming Year

Shall we make this W. C. T. U. year more intelligent than any previous one? "Yes," you say. First then, will you each as you read this, give three minutes' serious thought about subscribing for THE UNION SIGNAL, our national weekly. "Do I need it?" "Yes." "Ought I to support the publication?" "Yes." "Really and truly could I not afford it if I sincerely wanted it?" "Yes." "Shall I not subscribe right now?" "Yes." Then without laying this paper aside, call up THE UNION SIGNAL promoter or your president asking her to send on your name for you will give her your $1.50 at once.

Second, let every union at the next meeting appropriate money for subscriptions for each of the four general officers who are not on the list, that they may have the paper at once.

Third, each union should appoint a promoter of the UNION SIGNAL and W. C. T. U. literature, who shall examine our leaflets and supply each officer and superintendent with every good thing as soon as it is published.

Minnie E. Neal, President Florida W. C. T. U., in State W. C. T. U. paper.

Necessary Equipment

I shall be very glad to keep before the women, in my monthly letter to our state paper and as I go among them, the necessity of having the three officers equipped with our national organ.

Miss Esther Elfreth,
President New Jersey W. C. T. U.

State Organizers to Co-Operate

I will aid in every possible way in promoting the new plan, and will impress upon our state organizers the importance of the matter.

Mrs. Ella A. Gleason,
President Massachusetts W. C. T. U.

Sixty Subscriptions

"In my last two trips over the state," writes Mrs. Josephine E. Sizer, president of the Minnesota W. C. T. U., "I have secured sixty subscriptions to THE UNION SIGNAL (weekly edition). Many unions have adopted the Trio-Team plan."

"Can't Do Without It"

Your plan to have the three officers of every union—the Trio-Team—be sure of having the paper regularly is fine. I am calling the attention of our women to the plan in my monthly letter to our state paper. I cannot understand how members who are trying to do the work can get on without THE UNION SIGNAL.

Mrs. Mary R. Haslup, president Maryland W. C. T. U.

No Better Propaganda Than Union Signal

Wisconsin's UNION SIGNAL promoter writes:

"It has been our custom for several years to give UNION SIGNAL subscriptions to unions that make a net gain of fifty or more. We know of no better propaganda than THE UNION SIGNAL."

Ida M. Cooke, Green Bay, Wis.

Hearty Approval of Trio-Team Plan

I heartily approve THE UNION SIGNAL Trio-Team plan. I am sending to each union a card of inquiry, asking if the Trio-Team are already subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL and if not, that they fall in line with the Trio-Team proposal.

Mrs. T. Adelaide Goodno,
President North Carolina W. C. T. U.

"Splendid Idea"

I think the plan to put the weekly UNION SIGNAL into the hands of each member of the Trio-Team of every local union is a splendid idea. I will write directly to every local union and will also each month make the recommendation in my message to the state paper.

Mrs. Joseph Sprott,
President South Carolina W. C. T. U.

Pennsylvania Starts Trio-Team Plan in President's Union

"You may be very sure that I shall lend my cooperation and will be delighted if every local union in Pennsylvania subscribes for three copies of THE UNION SIGNAL. Our wide-awake Publicity superintendent made such a motion in my own local union. It carried and College Hill union is leading off." Thus writes Mrs. Ella M. George, president of the Pennsylvania W. C. T. U.

ATTORNEY GENERAL STARTS DRIVE FOR LAW ENFORCEMENT—CONGRESS BEGINS LONG TASK THAT MAY EXTEND INTO SUMMER—RESOLUTION INTRODUCED IN CONGRESS BECAUSE OF FRANCE'S STAND ON SUBMARINES—NEW CHAIRMAN FOR SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE—PRESIDENT AND FIRST LADY AT HOME TO THE GENERAL PUBLIC

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

The Congress convened Tuesday noon after the holiday recess. The death of Senator Penrose, senior senator from Pennsylvania, was announced in the Senate by Senator Lodge and in the House by Representative Butler, dean of the Pennsylvania delegation. Both houses, after adopting resolutions of sorrow and regret, adjourned out of respect.

CONGRESS BEGINS LONG TASK THAT MAY EXTEND INTO SUMMER

Budget Bills, Anti-Lynching, Newberry Contest Before the National Legislators This Week

For the first time House and Senate will deal with the measures supplying money for all governmental functions in budget form. These measures started through the House Judiciary January 5, when the Treasury appropriation was taken up.

The House passed the first annual supply measure drafted under the budget system—the Treasury Appropriation bill, carrying approximately $169,000,000, of which $9,250,000 is for enforcement of prohibition during the fiscal year, beginning next July 1.

Chairman Madden announced that from now on he will report one appropriation measure a week until all have been brought in, considered by the House and sent over to the Senate.

Despite a filibuster by opponents of the measure, the House voted 184 to 86 to take up the Dyer Anti-Lynching bill. Four hours were spent in roll calls demanded by Representative Garrett of Tennessee, minority leader, in an attempt to prevent discussion. The measure was set aside for consideration of the Treasury Appropriation bill, but it is expected that debate on it will be interspersed between various appropriation bills which will come from the House Committee in rapid succession.

Mr. Dyer, in opening debate on his measure, declared that it was imperative that the Federal government afford protection to persons liable to suffer violence at the hands of mobs.

Mr. Summers of Texas, in opposing the bill, declared its passage would increase rather than decrease mob violence and would have a tendency to engender race hatred. He assailed the measure on constitutional grounds, contending it would be an invasion of states' rights.

In the Senate the Newberry case will probably be decided early next week.

The bill authorizing the issuance of mileage books by railroads, interchangeable between lines of systems, is set down for consideration January 11. A vote may be taken immediately or the question can drag along as unfinished business until January 17, when there must be a vote on proposals to amend the Federal Reserve act, requiring the appointment at the next vacancy of a representative of the farmers to the Federal Reserve Board.

While the Senate is disposing of these three propositions, its Finance Committee expects to conclude hearings on the Permanent Tariff bill.

Then there confronts the Senate the probability of long debates on new international agreements resulting from the Washington Conference on Limitation of Armament, which will be added to the debates over the routine appropriation bills.

Resolution Introduced in Congress Because of France's Stand on Submarines

Representative Reavis of Nebraska has introduced a resolution which, if passed, would demand repayment by certain debtor nations of money loaned by the United States during the war. The text of the resolution follows:

"Whereas, the proceedings of the Conference on Limitation of Armament disclose a determination on the part of certain debtor nations of the United States to expend large sums of money on increased naval armament,

"Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), that it is the desire of Congress that the government of the United States advise such nation or nations through the proper channels that the payment of obligations now due to the United States will be acceptable."

Mr. Reavis' statement was in part as follows:

"The United States feels very great sympathy for the distress of Europe, aside from any selfish interest we may have in the matter. I do not doubt that Congress will be willing to fund the European debt, as suggested by the administration, if the necessity for it is made apparent. But with France standing unmoved before the prayers and pleadings of mankind for a tranquil world, and asserting the intention of vastly increasing the most barbarous and inhuman implement of war, viz, the submarine, I think it is time to wipe the tears of sympathy from our eyes and try to see with clearer vision what the present situation portends."

Attorney General Starts Drive for Law Enforcement

Attorney General Daugherty has called on the attorney generals and other law enforcement officers in every state in the Union to co-operate with the Federal government in the enforcement of the prohibition, food and fuel supply laws.

That a constructive program of co-ordinated action and co-operative effort may be arranged, Mr. Daugherty has asked the attorney generals to call conferences in their respective states, to be attended by the prosecuting attorneys of the counties and by United States attorneys. He pledged the earnest co-operation of the Department of Justice "and all of its agencies" in the campaign.

It is the desire of Mr. Daugherty that out of the conferences shall come a complete and effective working system with all law enforcement officers, which shall avoid duplication of effort and "a more prompt enforcement of existing law, as well as a uniformity in proceedings, sentences and fines."

He also wants the law enforcement officers of the states to first enforce their own laws before calling upon the Federal government to do it for them.

New Chairman for Senate Finance Committee

The vacancy in the chairmanship of the Senate Committee on Finance, made by the death of Senator Boies Penrose of Pennsylvania, will be filled, unless the traditional rule of seniority is broken, by Senator Porter J. McCumber of North Dakota. The chairmanship of this powerful committee, so potential in shaping tax and tariff legislation, is, for the first time since the civil war, to pass from the East to the West.

In the last sixty years there have been but eight chairmen of the Finance Committee, and all of them have represented states east of the Mississippi. With the accession of Mr. McCumber to the chairmanship, the agricultural interests will come into a position of greater influence, since he is the representative of a granger state.

Through the death of Senator Knox and Senator Penrose, Pennsylvania will have two new senators in this Congress, but neither will be eligible, under precedents established, for apportionment to the Finance Committee and, even though she contributes ten per cent of all the Federal taxes paid into the Treasury, she must surrender the position she has so recently held.

The President and First Lady at Home to the General Public

The New Year's reception at the White House was the "at home" day of the President and Mrs. Harding to the general public. These receptions date back to January 1 of the New Year when George Washington was President. Since then every President except President Wilson has observed the custom. Representatives of all classes—diplomats, officials and more than 5,000 "just folks"—walked past the receiving line for nearly six hours and were welcomed by the President and Mrs. Harding. As the seemingly unending line filed past and extended their greetings, the President and Mrs. Harding smilingly stood to receive them. Impressive in their simplicity, the rooms of the White House saw men who represent foreign nations mingle with the men who administer the affairs of this Republic and with citizens from every part of the nation.

The Diplomatic Corps was a mass of color as, waiting to be received, its members stood with full court dress and swords brightly jeweled hanging from their sides. Led by Ambassador Jules Jusserand, dean of the Corps, the Ambassadors and their full staffs greeted the President. Included were the representative of Germany, Carl Lang, and Edgar O. G. Prochink of Austria, the first accredited representatives of these two countries since diplomatic relations were severed in 1917, who had been presented to the State Department only a few days before.

The children, of whom there were many, were given special attention.

"Hello, dearie," the President said to one tot who was passing on a paternal shoulder.

The next moment the flickering line disclosed four small negroes marshaled ahead of their mother. "Why, look who's here," the President exclaimed and bent over and smiled at the little people with their flashing teeth and rolling eyeballs.

Philadelphia Reports Dry Merrie Christmas

"Christmas 'spirit' in the form of 'Volstead punch' and sparkling ginger ale" was found in Philadelphia cafes, restaurants and hotels on Christmas Eve, according to the reports brought in by the prohibition agents who made rounds for evidence of violation of the prohibition law. All together the number of persons arrested on a charge of intoxication was one hundred and sixty-two—less than the usual number of Saturday night celebrators, say the police.

The Force in Enforcement

As reports come in from various parts of the country, it is evident that the claims in regard to the impossibility of enforcing the dry law, made by those who wish to preserve as moist a climate as possible, will be difficult to prove.

"Chicago, awaking to review the annual New Year's eve festival, meditated upon a celebration probably the driest on record." So states the Chicago Tribune. "Prohibition Director Charles A. Gregory announced the city was 'fairly dry.' And it was. The law against selling liquor was effective. There was little public drinking or selling of whisky."

The Minneapolis Daily News prophesied "an almost bone-dry New Year's Eve," and that their expectations were fulfilled may be inferred from the fact that bootleggers reported that their expected New Year's business had fallen away to almost nothing because of the warning against poisoned "hooch".

All in all, throughout the United States the prohibition law was better enforced in most places during the holiday season than had been anticipated, and with less fatalities from drinking than in any previous year, according to prohibition officials.

Chicago's Mayor and Chief of Police For Law Enforcement

For many months Chicago has been the despair of the various reform organizations, which have made repeated complaints against violators of prohibition, wide-open saloons and vice resorts, but a number of violent outbursts of crime have brought a crisis.

Following the handing down of a decision by the city law department, Mayor Thompson issued a statement in which he said, "I have resolved to cleanse Chicago from murder, crime and corruption of every nature and close the hell holes where liquor and moonshine are said and proved to be sold. In my fight to accomplish this I don't propose to be thwarted by either friend or foe."

This statement was followed by one from Chief of Police Fitzmorris to commanding officers of the police department, in which he emphasized the fact that "it is the duty of the department to enforce strictly every provision of the law", and directed his men to see that this is done.

HOW THE MAJORITY OF MEDICAL MEN REGARD WINE, BEER AND WHISKY

During the first week of December the questionnaire given in full in The Journal of the American Medical Association, December 3, was sent to 53,900 physicians of the United States. The list included 43,900 names from the mailing list of The Journal, every other name being selected, and 10,000 from among those physicians who are neither members of the organization nor subscribers to The Journal, a similar method being adopted, using the American Medical Directory. No tabulation of disease conditions, of unnecessary deaths and suffering, or of the number of times a month that these beverages have been prescribed is included in the preliminary reports. The results in Illinois and Indiana will give some idea of all, and we are quoting therefrom.

The present Illinois law was passed by the legislature in May, 1919. It provides for complete prohibition, but allows physicians who hold permits to write not more than 100 prescriptions for whisky or brandy for one pint each every three months. The prescribing of beer or wine as medicine is forbidden.

In their replies 1,149 physicans held that whisky was a necessary therapeutic agent in the practice of medicine; 954 were of the opinion that it was not necessary. To the question, "Is beer a necessary therapeutic agent?" 668 voted yes, and 1,428 voted no. Eight hundred and four thought wine was necessary, and 1,288 thought not, while 405 physicians reported cases of unnecessary suffering or death from the prohibition of alcoholic liquors, and 1,589 had not known any such cases.

The Indiana Prohibition Act, adopted in February, 1917, and effective the next April, prohibits the manufacture and sale of any intoxicating beverages for any purpose whatsoever. Of the physicians answering this questionnaire, 362 thought whisky was necessary, and 598 called it unnecessary; 187 stated their belief in the necessity for beer, while 765 voted no; 211 said wine was necessary and 740 claimed that it was not. Of these last those who said yes considered it necessary chiefly for debilitated conditions, and as a substitute for whisky. Cases of unnecessary suffering or death resulting from prohibition had been found by 189 physicians, according to the report; 741 had found no such cases. Only 65 physicians had found it advisable to prescribe beer, and 664 had not; 64 had found it advisable to prescribe wine, and 654 had not found it advisable. That some restriction in prescribing alcoholic beverages was necessary was stated by 650 physicians; 275 stated that none was necessary.

Many interesting suggestions were made in regard to restrictions. A few from Illinois physicians are quoted herewith:

"In over thirty years of practice I have prescribed whisky in every case in which I thought it would help the patient. In this time three gallons would cover the entire amount I have prescribed."—Livingston County.

"As matters stand today, I would favor putting alcoholics under restrictions similar to what the Harrison law does to narcotics."—Champaign County.

"I am opposed to the internal use of alcohol in any and all diseases, and never advise its use."—Clay County.

"The average physician is anxious to maintain the dignity of his profession. He must, however, realize the peril that awaits the profession if the present lax condition continues and the indiscriminate sale of alcohol is encouraged."—Dewitt County.

"While I consider all alcoholic liquors, even alcohol itself, as entirely unnecessary in the practice of medicine, I do not believe that physicians should be restricted in their use of any substance which their judgment may indicate in any particular case."—Chicago.

"I prescribe whisky because it seems I cannot help it with many old friends and patients. I wish they would take permits away from us."—Chicago.

"The American Medical Association should so restrict its members that the unethical use of prescriptions for alcohol would cease."—Chicago.

"As a young physician I imagined that I could not treat certain diseases without the use of whisky or brandy, but after years of experience I find that my patients do as well if not better without them."—Chicago.

"I would wipe alcohol off the menu of therapeutic agents. If this were done I am certain that the new generation of physicians accustomed to the use of better agents than alcohol would have as good results or better."—Chicago.

"Freedom to prescribe alcohol will on the average cause more harm than good. It is better to restrict those who will prescribe whisky than to give free rein to the alcohol enthusiast."—Chicago.

"I think the 100 limit should be cut down to fifty, and the quantity to 8 ounces instead of 16 for the next year, and thereafter a limit of twenty-five prescriptions of 4 ounces each every three months. This plan would let the topers off gradually and would ultimately lead the medical profession out of the disgrace which has been shifted upon it."—Chicago.

"Some such restriction in the number of prescriptions each physician may write helps to take away temptation from the weak physician to commercialize this part of his practice."—Chicago.

The comments made by many of the physicians are of great interest, as showing their intensity of feeling on this subject. A few of those from Indiana follow:

"It is unfortunate that unprincipled men get into the medical profession, and that the honest doctor must suffer to some extent for the acts of the dishonest one. Therefore I am not in favor of permitting physicians to prescribe alcoholics, for the reason that the permission would be abused by the unscrupulous men."—Porter County.

"In my practice, very much more good has been done by the 'bone dry' law than the little harm. I would much sooner go without liquor for the few cases than see it sold from drug stores or saloons again."—Huntington County.

"I have enjoyed a good general practice for twenty-five years, and while I have used whisky to some extent in my practice during that time, I cannot recall any time when it was an absolute necessity."—Tippecanoe County.

"Have used no alcoholic liquors in my practice during the last twenty-five years, and am feeling proud of my results."—Corydon.

FRANCES E. WILLARD MEMORIAL FUND DAY

The articles published in this issue should create enthusiasm for the work of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union. The commemorative service should not be one of sadness but of sacred joy. It should not only commemorate the beautiful life and achievements of the founder of the World's W. C. T. U., but should win thousands of new members, and thousands of dollars for the Memorial Fund. The program outlined suggests articles which may be used, each union selecting for itself the desired material.

CATCH THE VISION!

Mary Harris Armor

Bulwer Lytton says: "Enthusiasm is the genius of sincerity and truth achieves no victories without it."

Believing this with all my heart, I long to see the seventeenth of February—Frances E. Willard Memorial Fund Day—enthusiastically observed this year by every local union. Too much cannot be said of the need for and value of this fund.

Not since the Magna Charta was wrested from the iron hand of King John has any nation written a law so far-reaching in its beneficent effects as is the Eighteenth Amendment to our Federal Constitution. It is the cornerstone of a brand new civilization, and means a new wealth, health, happiness and holiness.

The Fight for Enforcement Furthered Through The Fund

It seems incredible, in the face of its wonderful and blessed results, that any would dare oppose it, or seek its overthrow. But the forces of evil hate it as darkness hates light, as sin hates righteousness; and in fighting for its enforcement and extension, we are combating not merely the outlawed liquor traffic of America but the legalized liquor traffic of the rest of the world, together with all organized greed and institutionalized crime. The fight is a big one but "Success is as sure as the promises of God."

This is a critical time, as a new Congress is to be elected next year, and the liquorites will use every means, fair or foul, to elect men who will repeal the Volstead Act and make so lax the enforcement of the law as to bring it into contempt.

We need to "Educate, agitate and organize" with burning zeal and Christlike love.

We must put every force into the field and do it NOW. This means a tremendous outlay of thought, labor, literature and money.

A Call to Service Because of the Fund

I am an enthusiast on the subject of the Frances E. Willard Memorial Fund for several reasons, one of which is, that it was through this fund that I myself was brought into the blessedness of our white ribbon comradeship.

Mrs. Jennie Hart Sibley of blessed memory, during the days when Georgia was "missionary ground" so far as W. C. T. U. work was concerned, was enabled, through this fund, to promote the work in Georgia. Because of it I came to understand how, in the white heat of the Crusade fires, God had fused the heart of the womanhood of this nation, laid it on the anvil of His providence, and fashioned what He would—a vessel for His service, a weapon for His hand, a crown for His brow, and called it the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and I heard His voice calling me to enter into its blessed and heroic activities.

Campaigning for Members With the Help of the Fund

Another reason for my high regard for the Memorial Fund is that I have seen so much it has accomplished in many states. Last summer the heat in even our northernmost states was so intense as to discourage any effort on the part of state presidents with regard to the million membership campaign. Railroad fare was so high as to be almost prohibitive; in the face of the extreme financial depression good collections could not be expected, even with large audiences; and large audiences, in the midst of that energy-depleting and lethargy-producing heat, were not to be dreamed of. But the greater the lethargy of the people, the more pronounced the need to arouse them. The National W. C. T. U. offered to guarantee from the Memorial Fund the salary and all expenses of a speaker. Our wonderful national corresponding secretary, Mrs. Frances P. Parks, cheerfully undertook the herculean task of planning an itinerary through these states: Ohio, Michigan, Minnesota, North Dakota, Montana, Idaho (North), Washington (East), Washington (West), Oregon, California and Texas. The presidents co-operated so splendidly that nearly a thousand new members were secured, many new unions organized, old ones stimulated, a splendid enthusiasm engendered for law enforcement and the million membership campaign—and the collections paid all the expenses!

This would have been impossible without the advance from the Memorial Fund. If we win our million members by 1924, those who go out to speak should not have to ask for money—but for members only. Few, if any states, can afford to employ workers unless collections are taken to defray expenses, at least in part.

Fund May Mean "A Cleaner Earth and a Closer Heaven"

If every local union will catch the vision of the opportunity and hold a splendid, enthusiastic meeting on February 17, forwarding the entire collection to the national treasurer, Mrs. Margaret C. Munns, for the Frances E. Willard Memorial Fund, it may enable the National W. C. T. U. to put into the field such forces as will stir the public conscience far "above what one can ask or think".

It may mean: A Million Members, a Million Dollars, a Dry Congress, World Prohibition, "a cleaner earth and a closer Heaven."

"According to your faith be it unto you".

THE ANNUAL W.C.T.U. PROGRAM AT CHAUTAUQUA INSTITUTION MADE POSSIBLE BY FRANCES E. WILLARD MEMORIAL FUND

Maude B. Perkins, National General Secretary Young People's Branch

The early history of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is closely linked with that of the Chautauqua Institution and it is interesting to recall that each came into existence in the same year—1874. Of the many forward movements initiated, none is more far-reaching in its activities than the W. C. T. U., brought into being as the result of the famous "call" sent forth from Chautauqua, and as the years go by, no other organization is given a more prominent place on the program and few have contributed more to Chautauqua's greatness.

Kellogg Hall, W. C. T. U. headquarters, with its famous Tiffany art glass memorial window to Frances E. Willard—the gift of John and Emilie Martin—is usually sought out by visitors. It has always been a center for the discussion of the newest phases of the prohibition reform, and has attracted to Chautauqua the most prominent leaders of our organization. One can scarcely estimate the value of our wonderful temperance organization to the "searcher after knowledge," as the real Chautauquan is so often called.

As the Woman's Christian Temperance Union has advanced to world organization, so has the Chautauqua Institution. Its growth has been almost parallel with the development of the W. C. T. U.

Through "Liquor Problem Week," as the temperance program was first called, not only the American phase of the prohibition question was considered by Frances E. Willard, Lillian M. N. Stevens, and others as speakers, but the English phase was presented by Mrs. Ormiston Chant and our missionaries from every country. "Liquor Problem Week" gave place to "W. C. T. U. Week" when other women prominent in national and world work began to speak from the Chautauqua platform. High license, local option, county option, state control, the dispensary system, and every other method of dealing with the liquor traffic were discussed but the W. C. T. U. stood first, last and all the time, for national prohibition and kept that slogan everlastingly before the public until it has permeated almost every corner of the globe. The fact that the doctrine of prohibition was proclaimed at Chautauqua led many an individual to go out and work for it.

WHAT THE MEMORIAL FUND MEANS TO OUR OUTLYING FIELDS—ALASKA, PORTO RICO, THE PHILIPPINES

Mrs. Cornelia Templeton Hatcher, President Alaska W. C. T. U.

"Why haven't we known about this wonderful work for women in the fight against the liquor traffic? Why haven't we had an organizer in here before?"

The time was July, 1916, the occasion a prohibition campaign, and the interrogator a leader in woman's club, civic, and professional circles in the largest interior city of Alaska. She had been there many years, always in the forefront of every battle with the foes of good government and common decency,—but she had never before come in contact with the work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. It was a revelation to her, and as the scope and power of our "Do Everything" policy was gradually unfolded, the insistent query was reiterated, "Why haven't we had an organizer in here before?"

"Because the size of the country, the distances between towns, the great expense of travel here and the widely scattered population make it impossible for an organizer to finance such a trip."

"How, then, did you happen to come, now?"

"Because Alaska is in a territorial prohibition campaign and the National W. C. T. U. finances this trip from the Frances E. Willard Memorial Fund."

THE FUND PERPETUATES MISS WILLARD'S LIFE WORK

Whereupon followed more eager inquiries concerning the fund,—how it came to be, and how it is maintained and disbursed. Naturally, the organizer took pride and pleasure in rehearsing the "old, old story"—for this story of the Frances E. Willard Memorial Fund is preeminently one of tribute to Christian faith and courage, told annually in the sacrifice and patient labor of the army of consecrated women who march under the white banner of prohibition.

"To perpetuate her life work. To extend the far-flung battle line against the forces of evil. To win recruits to the ranks. What a magnificent memorial to a beloved leader. And you say it requires but $2.00 annually from each local union to make all this possible? What a privilege to belong." Thus mused this new disciple to the creed of Frances Willard for the Woman's Christian Temperance Union—"To make the world more homelike for humanity."

SUPERLATIVE ACHIEVEMENT MADE POSSIBLE

How inadequate, at times, seems the English language, when one would deal in superlatives. And the story of what the Willard Memorial Fund has done for Alaska, for Porto Rico, for the Philippines, aye, and for many of the so-called missionary fields in "the States," is one of superlative achievement. Making due allowances for differences in the extent of territory, in climatic conditions, in racial and religious problems, the story of one is the story of all.

"Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel," is a literal command to those who believe that the use of alcoholic liquors is the greatest hindrance to the coming of Christ's kingdom on earth. It has been wonderful to recount the achievements and the growth of the white ribbon army in Ohio, the Crusade state; in New York, the Empire state; in Pennsylvania, the Keystone state, of our big republic; but the great heart of Frances Willard, and those of the noble women who followed her in leadership, have ever yearned over the frontier fields where men and women struggle to plant the seed of Christian citizenship among the tares of vice in its most lawless forms. Alaska, to the average easterner, has always spelled ice and snow, gold and fur, drinking and gambling, the dance hall and the brothel; and the picture was appallingly accurate in the days when the first W. C. T. U. pilgrims made short excursions into the "pan handle" of a territory that is, in area, twelve times as large as the state of New York.

BEGINNINGS OF W. C. T. U. WORK IN ALASKA

In 1888 Jessie Ackerman administered the W. C. T. U. pledge to Edward Marsden, an Indian lad who, as an ordained minister of the Presbyterian Church, now serves a native congregation at Metlakatla and preaches always the gospel of total abstinence from alcohol. In 1897 Belle Kearney enlisted the interest of Mrs. Brady, wife of the governor, and a semblance of W. C. T. U. organization was effected. In 1898 Sarah E. Shorthill was requisitioned, more than once, as the representative of Christian womanhood, to read the burial service for unfortunates who fell by the wayside in the great gold rush through Skagway to the Klondike.

PIONEERING UNDER THE FUND

During the ten years following, our work in Alaska was sporadic, the few local unions being dependent upon the missionaries for sustenance. Not until the establishment of the Willard Memorial Fund was it possible to undertake anything in the way of permanent organization, which involved an itinerary of the towns in southeast Alaska, this being made in 1908 by Mrs. William Connor of Ohio, then resident in Ketchikan. In 1909 the writer, then managing editor of THE UNION SIGNAL, accompanied by Mrs. Jennie M. Kemp, head of the Circulation department, made her first tour of the Alaskan coast towns, going as far West as Seward. Returning in 1910, as the special representative of the National W. C. T. U., the editor, in the following year, became an Alaskan "by marriage," and thus her personal fortunes became inextricably interwoven with those of the Alaska W. C. T. U. In 1913 Mrs. Lora LaMance made an organizing trip to the coast towns and perfected a territorial organization. In 1915 the Alaska legislature passed a prohibition referendum bill and "The fight was on."

With the background of work outlined above, leadership in the proposed campaign,—if there was to be a campaign,—devolved upon the W. C. T. U. But how could it be financed? No officer or worker in the Alaska union has ever received monetary compensation for her services; but, generous as Alaskans are, the possible contributions from audiences reached could not be expected to cover the bare cost of the itinerary through the great interior country. Then came to the rescue the national union with the Willard Memorial Fund. What were the immediate needs? A house-to-house worker for the coast towns, covering a stretch of 2,500 miles between Seattle and Anchorage, undertaken by Mrs. Eva Gilmore of Seattle whose collections met her expenses; a notable speaker for the same itinerary, for which Mrs. Ella A. Boole, national vice-president-at-large, volunteered her services; and an itinerary by the territorial president through the virgin fields of the great interior where the organized enemy was most strongly intrenched, involving nearly 10,000 miles of travel and lasting from May 11 to September 4!

The results? An active local union in every incorporated town, from Ketchikan at the southern boundary line, to Nome on the Behring sea,—the farthest North city under the United States flag!

The election? Alaska voted dry, two to one!

What next? The presentation of the referendum ballot in an appeal to Congress for the enactment of a prohibition law.

TURNED TO THE W. C. T. U. FOR LEADERSHIP

Here, again, the forces that had contributed to the success of the campaign, turned to the W. C. T. U. for leadership. The territorial president went to Washington as their personal representative, and such part of her expenses as were not met by voluntary contributions from her constituents, was paid from the Memorial Fund. The law passed by Congress for Alaska is one of the best in existence.

Five years have passed. Alaska suffered severely in loss of population and decrease in industry through the war. In several towns the churches are closed; in many no semblance of W. C. T. U. activity remains. For three years the territorial president has been "outside" or isolated in a mining camp, yet holding to the silver cord of comradeship through the medium of correspondence. In all reverence the work might have been characterized as "not dead, but sleeping." For behold, suddenly there is a stirring in the tree tops; a Chinook wind brings messages relating to official changes that will, we hope, mean something for law enforcement. Then the definite word, "Alaska is to have a Federal prohibition director! Will the W. C. T. U. endorse Mr. Blank for that office?" No? Then this Mr. Blank, or that Mr. Blank! The workers bestir themselves; they take counsel with their brothers in the churches. A candidate is chosen who, they believe, will honestly represent them in this very important work.

SEND YOUR PRAYERS WITH YOUR OFFERING

Wasn't it worth while? We do not arrogate to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union all credit for prohibition achievement in Alaska. Too much cannot be said in recognition of the support accorded the movement by friends in all walks of life, including Delegate Wickersham, then in Congress, and Delegate Sutherland, now representing Alaska in that body. But the W. C. T. U. was the only ORGANIZED force in the field, and its organization was made possible by the Willard Memorial Fund, a sacred trust fund that is used only for the extension and strengthening of the work to which Frances Willard gave her life. It more nearly represents the spiritual force of the widow's mite than any material agency of which we have cognizance. With your offering to that fund in 1922, send your prayers and your benediction.

THE MEMORIAL FUND A SOUND INVESTMENT WITH AMPLE RETURNS TO HUMANITY

Fannie A. Drummond, National Field Secretary, Young People's Branch

For real thrills go to Texas. That is where the writer found them when, through the aid of the Frances E. Willard Memorial Fund, doing pioneer work on the western plains. Texas is certainly a place of "magnificent distances." To one living in Ohio, or in any state with a net-work of electric and railroad lines, it is a new experience to travel for a day, and perhaps a night, to get to a meeting.

We were given a schedule, plans, and dates and sent westward to organize a new district! According to the constitution, three counties must be organized in order to form a district union.

One county was in good, running order. A second was still organized, but it was in somewhat the same condition as the man who said he had religion "off and on" for forty years. The third county was new territory.

After a journey of many hours our destination was finally reached. The train was late, and with little chance to banish the stains of travel, we stood before a crowded high school already assembled in a temporary building. Next, we were whirled to a ward school, modern and up-to-date, and matching the big prairies in roominess and outlook. The reception accorded was all that could be desired.

The evening meeting was a public one held in a beautiful Baptist church, and at the close of the address, with much confidence and enthusiasm we announced the coming district convention.

In the next county, we found the town where we stopped, in the midst of a big union revival meeting, with a boy preacher in charge and people standing in line waiting for the church doors to open. An evening meeting was impossible, but we spoke in the different Sunday schools and the next day we had an afternoon meeting of the W. C. T. U.

Such wonderful, big hearted, hospitable women are the Texas white ribboners!

We were to have luncheon one day with the local W. C. T. U. president, and we found her a delightful, cultured young mother. In answer to our question, "Are you a Texan?" she answered "Oh, no. I used to be a member of a Y. P. B. at Columbia, Missouri." Further conversation brought out the fact that four college girls from that one Y. P. B. are today local W. C. T. U. presidents in four different states. Moral, reach the young people and boost the Y. P. B.

But I am forgetting to tell the story of that district convention. We reached the unorganized county, and with a big supply of enthusiasm and good humor,

> The Woman's Christian Temperance Union is to my thought but a vast and growing network of telegraph lines, along which fly swift and blessed messages transmitted by that Divine Spirit whose central battery is the heart of Christ. Slow, difficult, and adventurous as is the work of building these lines, establishing the stations, enlisting and teaching the operators, one forgets the hardship in remembering what are the messages and whence they come throbbing over the wires with their sweet "Peace on earth, good will to men".
> —Frances E. Willard

began personal work for members. We met women from many states, some of whom had been identified elsewhere with the Y. P. B., and we found fine material for local and district officers. But out of that splendid list of new members secured, not one was free to come out at the time scheduled to a local meeting to perfect an organization, much less attend our district convention. What to do, was the question. That schedule had been made at state headquarters and announcements sent to the counties, and the distances were so great.

The day for the district convention arrived. A visiting nurse (one of the new members) who drove a Ford, kindly offered to meet the delegates. With a smile, at least the semblance of one, the writer accompanied her.

Few would make the sacrifices of some of those delegates. One woman had left eighteen boarders in her home, and there was no train returning until midnight. We had a good meeting, but we could not organize the district without having first effected a local organization. We did our best to rally the forces for an evening meeting, but every organization and club woman in the town seemed to have a special engagement. Finally, in sheer desperation, with failure facing us, we said, "It must be done. We were sent to do the work and we will have to camp on the trail until it is accomplished."

We declined to attend any function that night, and tired and sick at heart, went to bed to dream of walking, walking through Texas sand, and dragging an impossible burden. The next moment some one called "Mrs. Drummond! Mrs. Drummond! Are you asleep? A telephone call says all those people are coming for a meeting, and it is only a little while until the train goes."

Promptly we elected officers and every good husband present became an honorary member. Then, presto change! The district convention was in full session and the new district officers elected!

There are great sections of Texas, as large as some of our New England states, which are yet untouched by the work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Splendid, cultured Christian women have gone out from older states to reside in this new commonwealth. They are eagerly anticipating the coming of the white ribboners to organize and establish the work so dear to them and to their mothers "back home."

The Frances E. Willard Memorial Fund makes it possible for W. C. T. U. organizers to go into these fields. No greater opportunity is open to us as an organization.

FUND AIDS MEMBERSHIP CAMPAIGN IN OREGON

Madge J. Mears, State Corresponding Secretary

When the plans for Mother National in regard to the campaign for a million members were received by Oregon, we felt we must do our part, and, if possible, double our enrollment. But the task seemed a gigantic one when we considered the vastness of our state, with the large amount of territory that could not be reached by railroads, and the many hardships to be endured, including miles of travel by stage. It could not be done without great financial outlay—that we knew. But the need for the work was plain and the women of Oregon, like W. C. T. U. women all over the land, believe that "when a thing ought to be done, with God's help it can be done."

When the regional conference leaders visited Portland in February, 1921, and counsel with our national corresponding secretary, Mrs. Frances P. Parks, brought out the fact that there was a chance for us to get some aid from the Frances E. Willard Memorial Fund to help finance the work, we were much encouraged. We entered into a compact to match, dollar for dollar, a grant from the fund, and to route the state organizer in unorganized territory.

Later, when we received from Mother National the money to help us, we immediately tried out the plan which we thought would be most successful in that part of the state in which we wanted to organize—a house to house canvass—and it proved most satisfactory.

We knew that so often when we send a speaker into a town, or a country community, and announce a temperance meeting, only the few who are especially interested will attend and we fail altogether to interest those we most desire to reach. Under the plan we adopted our worker went to the homes, presented the program of the W. C. T. U., told of the need of the community for just such an organization and in this way brought our message to women outside the ranks. In nearly every place visited, a W. C. T. U. was organized and in a few instances where a union was not formed, names of those who would join and pay their dues into the state treasury, until it was possible to organize, were secured.

The success of this plan was even greater than we had hoped for, as our record for about three months' work, during which time eighteen counties were visited, was a net gain of 1,379 new members, making us lack only 584 of doubling our enrollment. This increase was the result of the organization of forty-four new unions, and the strengthening of old unions by the addition of new members, the gain, in some cases, being more than fourfold. One of the encouraging things accomplished during this campaign was the enlistment of a number of young women as members and we hope much interest in the cause will result. We feel sure that the aid given us by Mother National, and duplicated by a like amount from the state treasury, did much to help our work in Oregon, and we realize that we are only beginning to reap the results of what such a campaign meant to the state. We are sure that what is true of Oregon can be made true of any state where consecrated house-to-house workers are willing to give the best of their strength and ability to the work.

There is yet much untouched territory in Oregon and we hope this year to do better than ever before, for we are not going to be satisfied until in every county in our state the W. C. T. U. is organized and carrying on its work for "God and Home and Every Land."

The Frances E. Willard Memorial Fund and the Membership Campaign

The second goal in the Jubilee program is the Million Members Campaign, and the only fund available for pushing it is the Frances E. Willard Memorial Fund. Every local union will consider it a privilege at its February meeting to make a generous contribution to this fund, to help in the mobilizing of a million members.

The Meaning of a Million Members

Have you ever caught the vision of what it would mean to have a million members enlisted in the ranks of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union? Not simply a million names written on the record books of the organization, but a million women on fire with the big purposes and hopes and holy ambitions that are the soul of the white ribbon movement.

Visualize a million members in a million homes teaching their sons and daughters the principles of abstinence, peace, purity, neighborliness, reverence for law; a million women in church and Sunday schools aflame with holy zeal in the warfare against social evils; a million women incarnating the spirit of true neighborliness to the foreign women of their towns; a million women tactfully and lovingly counseling and giving assistance to expectant young mothers; a million women trained in the responsibilities of citizenship, going to the primaries and to the polls to vote intelligently and conscientiously; a million women in the schoolroom, the factory, the office, the store, the home, working together to promote reverence for an observance of law; a million women of world vision and missionary spirit, striving with their prayers, their money and devoted service to make safe and pure and homelike the whole world.

A family circle of a million members—what could it not accomplish for God and Home and Every Land? Shall not the vision be realized?

Frances E. Willard, The Master Organizer

The seed for the million member harvest was sown years ago by that master organizer, Frances E. Willard. It is literally true that she implanted the principles that have made the Woman's Christian Temperance Union a power in all our national life in every state and territory, from the orange groves of California to Massachusetts' rock-bound coast, from the Canadian border to the Gulf of Mexico. The story of those early organizing years, especially in the far west, is thrilling, filled as it is with picturesque experiences in those pioneer days when now and then one must travel by stage coach to keep appointments. In one twelve-months, 1883, forever memorable as the organizing year, in fulfillment of a "stint" which Frances Willard set for herself, Miss Willard and Miss Gordon visited every state and territory of the Union, and all except one of their capitals, organizing most of the states west of the Rockies. One day, on the train, during the course of this historic tour, as they were studying the map of the United States, Miss Willard asked, "I wonder how many cities of 10,000 population or over we have visited since 1879?" Turning to a list in the census of 1880, Miss Gordon checked these off, one by one, and found that so thoroughly had the territory been covered that it would be possible during the remainder of the year, 1883, to complete the task of visiting all cities of 10,000 and over, thus reaching all the chief centers of the United States and many smaller cities. Everywhere she went Frances Willard gave her flaming message for total abstinence, purity, peace and prohibition, and organized state and local unions, or strengthened those already established.

While through the intervening years the work has increased in membership, power and influence, it will not reach its full fruition until at least a million women wear the bow of white, the insignia of the army of "organized mother love."

What more fitting way to honor the memory of Frances E. Willard, the master organizer, than in this year, 1922, to Mobilize a Million Members as a living memorial to her!

Memorial Fund Quiz

1. What is the Frances E. Willard Memorial Fund?

Ans.—This fund, for the extension and perpetuation of the principles and work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, was established at the National W. C. T. U. Convention in 1898. Each local union is urged to arrange for a public meeting on or near February 17 of each year, and to send the sum of two dollars or more, from the offering received, to the state W. C. T. U. treasurer, who will forward it to the National W. C. T. U. treasurer, Evanston, Illinois.

2. How is the fund used?

Ans.—For the extension and perpetuation of the principles and work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, in a general way. The membership campaign must be largely financed therefrom. The necessary money is by it provided to promote the causes for which the W. C. T. U. stands in Alaska, Porto Rico and the Philippines, and among the Negroes of the United States. The most needy fields are helped, campaign supplies are furnished, and from time to time special grants are made for special organization work. It is used, therefore, for ideal home missionary work.

3. What testimony could be given in regard to the benefits received from the use of this fund?

WHAT'S THE WORD? MOBILIZE A MILLION MEMBERS!

Frances P. Parks, National Corresponding Secretary

The campaign for 1922 began when the record closed for 1921 and continues throughout the W. C. T. U. year, state and national, with a period of intensive, nation-wide activities between April 24 and May 14.

New emphasis has been given to the value of group meetings for the training of leaders by the regional conferences which were held under the auspices of the National W. C. T. U. in 1920 and 1921. This year similar group meetings will be arranged for strategic points in nearly every state. The following states will introduce the series with a meeting in February or March, held under the auspices of the National and state W. C. T. U.: Massachusetts, Maine, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Maryland, Ohio, West Virginia, Tennessee, Alabama, Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, Missouri, Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Texas, Oklahoma, Kansas, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, South Dakota and Nebraska.

State, district, county, and local Trio-Teams are to be in attendance. Department leaders, national and state, will present plans for winning members by department methods. The program of activities adopted at San Francisco will be linked with state programs by specialists. In each case, the program will be made to meet the needs of every local union in that state.

White ribboners are urged to improve the opportunity to come into personal contact with their leaders throughout the entire field. New impetus and direction to work already under way will undoubtedly result from these meetings.

Another series of sectional meetings to be attended by Mrs. Maude B. Perkins, general secretary of the Young People's Branch of the W. C. T. U., is being arranged, with the same general purpose,—the training of county and local leaders, for the program of activities.

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awak'ning continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,

THE LILLIAN STEVENS LEGISLATIVE FUND

January sixteenth will ever be to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union a red letter day. It was on that date in 1920 that the legalized liquor traffic in the United States passed out of existence. Wherever "Old Glory" floats the liquor traffic, if it lives at all, lives as an outlaw —a thing accursed, a thing to be hunted and hounded, a thing against which the hand of every honest man is raised and for whose complete and speedy extinction the world over every good woman breathes her prayer to God.

So marvelous a victory over so terrible a foe did not come all at once, nor was it "put over" on an unsuspecting people by unfair means. Long years of education and preparation preceded the victory day. When on September 10, 1911, Lillian M. N. Stevens, for fourteen years the statesman leader of the W. C. T. U., at the close of the Maine campaign for the retention of the prohibitory law, issued her famous proclamation in the name of the W. C. T. U. calling for national constitutional prohibition within a decade, the thought seemed to many but the dream of an idealist or a fanatic. But God's hour was close at hand, the time was ripe for the great advance. Education, agitation and organization had prepared the way. The Victory Day had dawned.

Those who were privileged to listen to the marvelous address of Mrs. Stevens in which she pledged the National W. C. T. U. to highest service for constitutional prohibition and declared that "the God who hath led our hosts still leads and by the sign of the Cross we shall conquer," can never forget the thrill of that moment nor the absolute accord with which the vast audience rose and consecrated its powers to the accomplishment of the high purpose for which the dauntless leader pled. Though Mrs. Stevens was not permitted to see with human vision the victory day none can doubt that her spirit is with us rejoicing at the onward march of the cause she loved so well and her name will ever be indissolubly linked with national constitutional prohibition.

It is very fitting that the fund raised by the W. C. T. U. for legislative purposes should be called the Lillian Stevens Legislative Fund. The splendid service she gave in unstinted measure will be always remembered and her name perpetuated unto coming generations.

Events have proven that the work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is far from finished and the Christian temperance forces of our country cannot afford to dispense with the services of a body of women so thoroughly organized and equipped as is the W. C. T. U. The prohibitory law must be written not only on the statute books but in the hearts of our people. Reverence for law must become in the words of Abraham Lincoln, "The religion of the people." Support of the Eighteenth Amendment through its Enforcement Code must be as much expected and accomplished as the enforcement of any law. Concurrent legislation must be secured in every state to make enforcement more effective. In all this the W. C. T. U. must bear a part.

Our National legislative headquarters in Washington, D. C. must be maintained, not only that we may be a force in federal legislation for the enforcement of prohibition but for the promotion of many lines of public welfare of special interest to women and children and the homes of our country.

To the visitor who has seen the busy office of our legislative representative in the Bliss Building in Washington, no plea for its maintenance will be necessary. Its importance to the organization both for its moral effect and its actual business value cannot be over estimated.

The presence in Washington of National W. C. T. U. officers on many important occasions is necessary and is made possible by this fund.

A generous fund will many times render possible swift and effective action in emergencies where without such resources defeat could not be averted.

The Jubilee Fund does not provide for our legislative work. That is the special function of the Lillian Stevens Legislative Fund. Each local W. C. T. U. in the United States is asked to contribute at least one dollar a year to maintain this fund in memory of the fearless leader who so mightily inspired the temperance hosts of our country to move forward to the supreme and successful battle for national constitutional prohibition.

Sayings of Frances E. Willard

You cannot dream yourself into a character. You must hammer and forge yourself into one.

We do more good by magnifying in our common life the sense of brotherhood than by the gift of dimes or dollars.

We all believe that one of the choicest fruits of Christianity will be the growth of a bond of brotherhood and sisterhood so close among all nations, races and peoples, that we shall become truly kindred each to the other, and that great word Humanity, like a rolling wave of the ocean of God's love, shall wash out from the sands of time the words, caste, creed, sex, and even that good word patriotism, because we shall feel that the whole world is our country and all men are our kin. Every. utterance of appreciation, affection and friendship; every token of mutual co-operation; every stroke of honest hard work undertaken side by side; every sincere prayer, helps forward this beautiful day that we call the coming of the Kingdom of Christ.

It is women who have given the costliest hostages to fortune. Out into the battle of life they have sent their best beloved, with fearful odds against them. By the dangers they have dared; by the hours of patient waiting over beds where helpless children lay; by the incense of ten thousand prayers wafted from their gentle lips to Heaven, I charge you to give them power to protect along life's treacherous highway those whom they have so loved.

Colorado W. C. T. U. Treasurer Called Home

Mrs. Cora L. White, treasurer of the Colorado W. C. T. U., has been suddenly called to higher activities. Mrs. White had served as a state officer for nineteen years, first as recording secretary, then as treasurer. She was consecrated, devoted and loyal, with an unfaltering faith in God and great confidence in the white ribbon cause. Mrs. White's home going leaves her husband, mother and little daughter bereft, and the W. C. T. U. without the inspiration of a rare personality.

RED LETTER DAYS

January 16—National Constitutional Prohibition Day.
February 17—Frances E. Willard Memorial Day.

Honor Themselves by Honoring Frances Willard

When the Oregon legislature enacted a measure providing for the fourth Friday in October to be observed in the public schools throughout the state, to be known as Frances E. Willard day, the state superintendent of public instruction, J. A. Churchill, issued a pamphlet with a suggested program for the day. This provided for the reading of a brief history of Miss Willard, quotations from her writings, addresses, readings, essays, the salute to the flag and patriotic songs, closing with a history of prohibition in this country, and the explanation of the state anti-cigaret law.

In his foreword to the program, Superintendent Churchill said:

"Every boy or girl who learns of the mighty influence of the unselfish devotion of Frances E. Willard to a great cause and of the manner in which the world has realized on her efforts will appreciate an opportunity to join with his fellows in the observance of the day set apart by the legislature of Oregon for the schools of the state for that purpose.

"In every community there is an echo of the good that Frances Willard did for all humanity and when we join in revering her memory through a proper observance of the day we do honor to ourselves.

"I hope that in every schoolhouse where the school is in session the program as outlined herein will be presented."

Memorial Fund Quiz

Ans.—Books could be filled with the accounts of work made possible through this fund. The promotion of membership, in particular; the continuance, each summer, of the W. C. T. U. activities at Chautauqua; organization work in new territory; distribution of free literature for campaign use; advancement of the work among the colored people and in Alaska and other needy fields—all these achievements have been made possible through the Memorial Fund, inadequate as it has been to meet all the needs. Articles in this issue of THE UNION SIGNAL furnish further testimony.

4. What is the responsibility of each union as to the need for the Fund?

Ans.—Each local union in the United States should consider it a privilege to arrange for the meeting on or near February 17 and to send the sum of $2.00 or more from the offering received, to help carry on the work during the coming year.

5. What is the relation between the Membership campaign and the Memorial Fund?

Ans.—The Memorial Fund is pre-eminently an organizing fund, and makes the National Organization department a "right hand of power" in the Jubilee Membership campaign. Through it, is often met in part the financial obligation involved in some new but promising organizing plan. To reach every part of the country it needs to be greatly increased.

6. Tell something of the work in Alaska made possible through the Memorial Fund.

Ans.—(See article by Mrs. Cornelia T. Hatcher in this issue).

7. How has the Memorial Fund furthered the work of the W. C. T. U. in Texas?

Ans.—(See article by Mrs. Fannie A. Drummond).

8. What has been accomplished in Oregon because your union and others have given to this Fund?

Ans.—(See article by Mrs. Madge J. Mears).

9. Give a four minutes talk on Chautauqua and the Memorial Fund.

Ans.—(See article by Mrs. Maude B. Perkins).

10. What is YOUR UNION going to do for the Fund?

Ans.—?

"Don't You Forget It!"

The life of Frances Willard was rich in strikingly significant incidents, which can be retold with as fine application to present day events as when first related. Mrs. Anna R. Simmons, honorary president of the South Dakota W. C. T. U., herself a pioneer in the white ribbon movement, sends the following story:

In a certain community where the battle between the liquor interests and the temperance forces was at its height, Miss Willard was told upon her arrival of a declaration made the previous day by a representative of the liquorites in a public meeting. He had said, "We have the voters on our side, we have the saloonkeepers on our side, and we have money on our side. And money is power, power, and don't you forget it!'"

When Miss Willard spoke, she referred to the challenge of her opponent, and retorted with fervor, "I would tell the representative of the drink interests, 'We have the church on our side, we have the women on our side, and we have God on our side. And God is a power, and don't you forget it!'"

W. C. T. U. Program at Chautauqua Made Possible By Frances E. Willard Memorial Fund

Suffrage, as a part of our program, was made popular at Chautauqua at a time when to speak of "votes for women" almost meant social ostracism, but the Woman's Christian Temperance Union kept always at it.

From "W. C. T. U. Week" to a big "W. C. T. U. Day" was the next step. Our best known lecturers, scientific temperance and jubilee exhibits, an Americanization school under the joint auspices of the W. C. T. U. and the Chautauqua Institution, and other mediums of information, have kept thousands of Chautauquans awake to our expanding program. Our speakers were never more welcome than now when Law Enforcement is the issue and World Prohibition the goal.

The work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union at Chautauqua is made possible by donations to the Frances E. Willard Memorial Fund. The W. C. T. U. has contributed to every phase of the Chautauqua program and the plans formulated for 1922 promise one of the best of seasons. Our headquarters on Ramble Avenue are always open, and visiting friends and members, who are cordially welcomed, are asked to register and learn of our activities on the grounds. New furniture makes the room most attractive.

Every state W. C. T. U. paper ought to give much publicity to our work at Chautauqua.

At no other place, unless it be National W. C. T. U. Headquarters at Evanston, Illinois, or a National or World's W. C. T. U. convention can one get as much information for definite prohibition work as at Chautauqua. This fact has brought to that famous Mecca for educators some of the most enthusiastic friends of the organization.

Chautauqua, always open to the newest and best along all lines, gives a welcome to the forward program of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Perhaps one of the greatest tributes paid to a W. C. T. U. speaker by any institution was that tendered by President Bestor when he said of the speech of our national president, "Without doubt, one of the most significant addresses of the year was that on South America, delivered by Miss Gordon."

Let us make the Chautauqua program for 1922 a memorable one.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

A FORWARD LOOK—MAKE 1922 A RECORD-BREAKING YEAR

Maude B. Perkins, National General Secretary Young People's Branch

Let us begin the new year with a determination to accomplish a certain thing, and so plan our work that when we begin the year 1923 we may have reached a certain goal and proven that the young people of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union under the plans of the Young People's Branch have contributed to the forward work of the mother organization.

In this issue of the UNION SIGNAL there will be given a goal as it has been established for every state.

This is not set for you, dear friend, so that you will aim to outdo another state but for your encouragement. If you will realize that I have tried to base this goal on the work that you have each done and then endeavor to surpass your own past record, we shall indeed make an enviable showing. After all that is the only kind of a race to run,—to beat your own past. I can hear you saying, in every part of this great country, "We can and by God's grace we will!"

The 1922 Year Books will soon be ready for distribution. Our entire plan is based on this established goal and the work is so arranged that as you take up departmental work, or the special lines offered by our national directors, you will be working toward this goal.

Surely, Christian young people, members of the greatest reform organization in the world today, you will study to become good citizens in this glorious country, and the Young People's Branch is the school in which to get your training. Make your Branch a recruiting station and so instil into the mind of every young man and woman in YOUR community the reasons for prohibition and its results, that the law may be enforced.

The following poem will help us to measure up to our opportunities and privileges:

I asked the New Year for some motto sweet,
Some rule of life with which to guide my feet,
I asked and paused. He answered soft and low,
"God's will to know."

"Will knowledge, then, suffice, New Year?" I cried.
And ere the question into silence died
The answer came: "Nay, but remember, too,
God's will to do."

Once more I asked, "Is there no more to tell?"
And once again the answer softly fell,
"Yes, this one thing, all other things above—
God's will to love."

W. C. T. U. History in the Making

Mother-love works magic for humanity, but organized mother-love works miracles. Mother-hearted women are called to be the saviors of the race.—Frances E. Willard.

Do You Ever Attend Trials?

Federal Prohibition Commissioner Haynes, in a recent speech, said: "It has been suggested to me that the attitude of our public officials might be greatly changed if more of the better class of citizens were to attend court at the time of the trials of bootleggers. The friends of the law violators throng the court. The friends of the law stay away." Do the representative citizens of your town ever attend the trials of men arrested for violating prohibition laws? Do YOU ever attend the trials and thus show an interest in good government and proper law enforcement? A Chicago white ribboner recalls her visit to a Federal court when a crowd of notorious bootleggers were on trial. The court room was packed, the front seats largely filled with ex-saloonkeepers, their families and friends. She hesitated on the threshold, when the judge seeing her (and she imagines noting her white ribbon badge) beckoned to the bailiff to make room for her in the front row by asking one of the pro-liquor visitors to leave. The moral influence of the presence of good men and women cannot fail to oil the wheels of the machinery of justice.

Why Not a Citizenship Scrap Book?

Do you remember the time when your mother kept a scrap-book on her kitchen cabinet? In it were pasted the most promising formulae for doughnuts, pumpkin pie, or salad dressing found in the home department of her favorite periodicals, or furnished by neighbor, relative or friend. Perhaps you have outgrown that "old-fashioned" custom of your mother's. Today you have problems broader and more perplexing than those relating to culinary concoctions. As a voting citizen you have come to a point in your career where you need a scrap-book for your civic housekeeping. In fact, as you delve deeper into politics, you find the necessity for a whole library of scrap-books. Why not start Volume I without delay? Begin with Mrs. Deborah K. Livingston's "Studies in Government" and leave room for the new series of studies by the same author that will deal with local political problems. Preserve also other articles clipped from magazines and papers.

On the first page of this scrap-book paste the words of Frances Willard: "THE HOME IS THE EFFLORESCENCE OF WOMAN'S NATURE UNDER THE NURTURE OF CHRIST'S GOSPEL. SHE CAME INTO THE COLLEGE AND HUMANIZED IT. SHE WILL COME INTO GOVERNMENT AND PURIFY IT; INTO POLITICS, AND CLEANSE THAT STYGIAN POOL AS THE WATERS OF MARAH WERE CLEANSED; FOR WOMAN WILL MAKE HOMELIKE EVERY PLACE ON THIS ROUND EARTH."

And beneath this prophecy insert the text of the Nineteenth Amendment to remind yourself of your new responsibilities and your new privileges as a citizen of a nation with a "government of the people, by the people and for the people."

Coming Thro' the Year!

ANNA A. GORDON

(Tune, "Coming Thro' the Rye!")

If a body meet a body,
Coming thro' the year,
Shall a body ask a body,
Join us now and here?
Yes! our membership we'll double,
Jubilee is near!
We shall never count it trouble,
Coming thro' the year.

Catch Them on the Wing

"I always carry several blank membership cards in my hand bag," remarked a county president. "I find there is often opportunity in a casual conversation with a fellow traveler on a railroad train, an interurban or street car, to give an invitation to join the W. C. T. U., and with a card and fountain pen ready for use, one is more certain to win the new member." One might add to this wise suggestion that a copy of the pocket Law Enforcement Manual will furnish an excellent topic for conversation that will enable the white ribboner to introduce the big objective of the W. C. T. U.—law enforcement—and enlist the sympathy and interest of the stranger. As a logical sequence, and in answer to the inevitable question, "What can I do?" the Service Star window card may be described and a promise secured to help in the distribution and placing of these Law Observance posters.

What Would You Say?

(Answers to These Questions Will Be Given in Next Week's Paper)

1. WHAT WOULD YOU SAY if you were asked to tell the attitude of the American Medical Association on the value of alcoholic liquors as medicine?

2. WHAT WOULD YOU SAY if you were asked in how many states the use of alcohol for medicinal purposes is prohibited by law?

3. WHAT WOULD YOU SAY in answer to a query as to the percentage of physicians in the United States that have not taken out permits for alcoholic liquors for medicine?

4. WHAT WOULD YOU SAY if inquiry were made of you as to the provisions of the Supplemental Prohibition bill (Willis-Campbell bill) recently passed by both houses of Congress, and how it affected the use of alcoholic liquors for medicinal purposes?

5. WHAT WOULD YOU SAY if you were asked to tell what you think of the proposition of the opponents of prohibition to place a tax on wine and beer for the purpose of raising revenue for government expenses?

How the W. C. T. U. Helped Enforce the Law

Ella M. George, President Pennsylvania W. C. T. U.

In response to the appeal in THE UNION SIGNAL of December 1, that we give concise instances of actual work done in the way of law enforcement, I would say that Beaver county, (my own county) is said to be in the front line in law enforcement in Pennsylvania and it gives me pleasure to tell you how it came to occupy that place. It was not without strenuous efforts on the part of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and other temperance organizations. Beaver county was one of the first in the state to unite its temperance forces. We believe that in union there is strength. Under this co-operation, sentiment grew so that we were able to elect a "dry" judge. The legislature of 1921 decreed that we were to have an additional judge and Governor Sproul appointed another "dry" judge. The temperance sentiment in the county was so strong that at the November election, the Governor's appointee had no opposition, indeed he was the only candidate.

The grand jury last week returned a true bill against fifty-six violators of the liquor laws. We have had a lively time catching these violators and are looking forward to a lively time in convicting the offenders, but with two "dry" judges on the bench, the temperance people expect a sweeping victory. The district attorney of the county has a special responsibility in the enforcement of the prohibition law. To the district attorney of Beaver county much credit is due for apprehension of the violators. He is always "on the job."

The judges have not been at all lenient in the way of fines. From the time the state prohibition bill was signed May 5, 1921, to October 15, 1921, the court has handled ninety cases, all told, and of this number only nine cases have been lost; a total of eighty-one out of the ninety were won. The fines have ranged from $100 to $5000, bringing into the county treasury $36,000. This did not include the fifty-six cases in the December term of court.

We appreciate the fact that it has not always been the "little fellow" who has been caught, for among the last ones to be apprehended were some of the "higher-ups" such as prominent druggists, secretary of the chamber of commerce and some of the local officials.

As a part of its Americanization work, the Winfield, (Kans.) W. C. T. U. joined with several churches in giving a fine Christmas entertainment for Mexicans. Prof. Gutterez, Spanish instructor at Southwestern College, acted as interpreter of a fine address given by President Kirk, and of a response by a Mexican speaker. The program, which was greatly enjoyed by all, was given entirely in Spanish. A Christmas tree was the center of attraction. Tops, toys, dolls, candy, nuts, oranges and other good things were distributed to the Mexican visitors.

One of the Least

Agnes Beryl Curtis

"No, I don't think I've ever seen anything quite like that Sullivan boy. He is the strangest child I ever knew!" Miss Blake, teacher of the fifth grade, made a gesture of despair.

"Why, what is the matter with him?" demanded Mr. Ogden, the principal.

For answer, Miss Blake glanced over at a small boy disconsolately huddled in a seat in the back part of the school room. It was recess time and the merry shouts of happy children sounded outside on the sunny play ground, but he alone lingered behind.

"Why isn't he with the others?"

"That's just what I don't understand! He never has anything to do with the other children, takes absolutely no interest in his lessons, and then—the lies he tells!"

"'Lies?'" blankly echoed the principal, "what about?"

Miss Blake lowered her voice. "When I took the registration a month ago, Archie Sullivan wrote down his address as 16 Cherry Street. Then, last week, he said he lived at 10 Summit Avenue. Yesterday, I thought I'd try him again and he informed me quite innocently that he lived at 22 Linden Street. Then I reminded him that before he had given me Cherry Street and Summit Avenue. He said he'd made a mistake, that he lived at 22 Cherry Street. Now, if you've ever seen anything like that—"

"It's quite evident he doesn't want us to know where he lives—but why?"

Mr. Ogden turned suddenly toward the boy. "Archie, will you come here a moment?" Sullenly, the lad obeyed.

The principal carefully scrutinized the high forehead, the fine but resentful eyes, the clean-cut mouth. A good face, he mentally concluded. What was the trouble?

"Where do you live?" A strange look passed over the boy's face.

"'16?'"

"Yes—sir."

"Very well, Archie. Thank you."

The boy slouched back to his seat. The principal turned to Miss Blake.

"If you have time tonight after school, I wish you would look up all those addresses. We'll sift this matter to the bottom."

Miss Blake sought 16 Cherry Street. A portentous-looking house with a wide, sweeping veranda and daintily ruffled curtains met her gaze. An immaculate maid answered her ring.

"Does Archie Sullivan live here?" The maid stared.

"Does Archie Sullivan live here?" repeated Miss Blake.

"Oh, no! This is Mr. Thayer's."

"Can you tell me if a family by the name of Sullivan has lived in this neighborhood?" The girl shook her head. "I've been here five years and I've never heard of the Sullivan's."

"Thank you." Miss Blake slowly descended the steps.

"I'll try Cherry Street—just a few doors down," she told herself.

Number 22 Cherry Street was a little, vine-covered cottage with a homey porch and red geraniums peeping through the window. A motherly-looking woman came to the door.

"Oh, no!" she smiled in answer to Miss Blake's question, "there's no Archie here—only Johnnie and Margaret." At this, two healthy youngsters peeped from behind their mother's protecting skirts.

WONDERFUL CONFIDENCE

Many charged with the care of children, turn instinctively to

as a dependable means of sustaining growth and vitality. You could not do better than profit by this confidence.

Scott & Bowne Bloomfield, N.J. 20-52

"Where does he live?" pondered Miss Blake.

Number 22 Linden Street led her to the outskirts of the town—a tall, gaunt, yellow house about which lingered a very precise air. Miss Blake knocked repeatedly but could get no answer.

Presently feminine tones sounded from the regions of the upper story window. "What do you want?"

Miss Blake felt rather foolish as she strained her eyes and lifted her voice. "Does Archie Sullivan live here?"

"Archie Sullivan?" screamed the irate woman, "I should say not! I live here alone!" The window came down with a bang. Miss Blake laughed until the tears ran down her cheeks. "This is a pretty mess! Now for Summit Avenue!"

Summit Avenue was in the business section. Over Number 10 a glaring sign proclaimed that Tannenbaum & Bros. sold the best grade of hardware.

With a sinking heart, Miss Blake entered the shop. From behind a greasy curtain emerged a hawk-eyed man with a teethy smile.

"Does Archie Sullivan live here?"

"Archie? Vat Archie? No Archie! Ve zell—"

"I want Archie Sullivan!" cried Miss Blake in desperation, "I've made a mistake!"

"No Archie but ve zell—"

Miss Blake fled. Utterly discouraged, she slowly threaded her way home through the hurrying crowds. Then—she caught sight of Archie—yes, it was Archie darting up a dingy stairway.

What Would You Say?

(Answers to List of Questions in THE UNION SIGNAL for January 5.)

1. WHAT WOULD YOU SAY if you were asked to name the three general methods prescribed by the national prohibition law for enforcing prohibition?

Ans. In addition to all of the laws of the states which should be enforced by the officers of the states, three methods are provided for securing the enforcement of the National Prohibition Act:

(a) Criminal provisions, found in Sections 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 21, 25, and 26 of the National Prohibition Act.

(b) Injunction and abatement. The second method for enforcing national prohibition is to abate the place where liquor is sold as a nuisance. The procedure is much more speedy. It provides for a temporary injunction, and upon final hearing, for a permanent injunction.

(c) Prohibitive Tax.

2. WHAT WOULD YOU SAY if you were asked what penalties are prescribed by the national prohibition law for a person who manufactures or sells liquor in violation of the law?

Ans. Any person who manufactures or sells liquor in violation of this title shall, for a first offense, be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not exceeding six months, and for a second or subsequent offense shall be fined not less than $200 nor more than $2,000 and be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than five years.

3. WHAT WOULD YOU SAY if you were asked what the national prohibition law has to say about the advertising of contrivances or recipes for the making of intoxicating liquors?

Ans. Section 18 of the statute provides:

"It shall be unlawful to advertise, manufacture, sell, or possess for sale any utensil, contrivance, machine, preparation, compound, tablet, substance, formula direction, or recipe advertised, designed, or intended for use in the unlawful manufacture of intoxicating liquor".

4. WHAT WOULD YOU SAY as to the right of any persons, injured in person or property by an intoxicated person, to recover damages as provided by law?

Ans. Section 20 of the National Prohibition Act provides that any person who shall be injured in person, property, means of support, or otherwise by any intoxicated person, or by reason of the intoxication of any person, whether resulting in his death or not, shall have a right of action against any person who shall, by unlawfully selling to or assisting in procuring liquor for such intoxicated person, have caused or contributed to such intoxication, and in any such action such person shall have the right to recover actual and exemplary damages. It is also provided that in the event of the death of either party such right of action shall survive for the benefit of the estate of the deceased.

5. WHAT WOULD YOU SAY if you were asked what two branches of the Federal government are charged with the enforcement of the prohibition law?

Ans. The National Prohibition Act provides that two branches of the Federal Government shall be charged with its enforcement. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, his assistants, agents and inspectors are charged with the duty of inspecting and reporting violations of the Act to the United States District Attorney for the District in which committed. The District Attorney is charged with the duty of prosecuting such cases under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States.

A Tribute

Della F. Withers, Circulation Manager.

The planting of memorial trees on Armistice Day was a beautiful tribute paid to our soldier boys. These trees will gladden the eyes and shelter and protect the weary ones of future generations.

February 17 is for our W. C. T. U. organization a day of tribute to another soldier—a woman with such love for all, as to be willing to give her life in a fight to rid the world of one of mankind's worst enemies. Frances Willard braved hardships, dangers, discourtesies and ridicule for the cause we are helping to carry on. Would it not be a fitting tribute to plant a truth, a right thought, in some consciousness; this thought, like a pebble thrown in the water, forming ever larger circles until temperance shall have encircled our world.

Should the time be almost out, why not renew your subscription to THE UNION SIGNAL? Find out if the officers of your local union, the public library, ministers, teachers, clubs, depots, friends are supplied, and by sending a subscription to THE UNION SIGNAL for some one, plant a truth-bearing memorial to a great leader and soldier.

Frances Willard's clear vision saw the necessity for every W. C. T. U. member keeping fully informed on the issues concerning their cause, and she knew that for good team work, a paper publishing facts, giving working plans, enlightening and elevating thought was essential—hence THE UNION SIGNAL came to be. She loved the "letter from home" as she called it, and urged again and again that every member take it and give it to others.

TEN WAYS TO RAISE MONEY TO GIVE A YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO THE UNION SIGNAL TO EACH OF THE TRIO-TEAM OF THE LOCAL UNION

1. BIRTHDAY BANKS. Establish a birthday bank in your local union, and ask each member having a birthday to give a penny for each year of her age. Call for these birthday thank-offerings at every meeting, and keep it up until you have sufficient money for the three subscriptions, only $4.50.

2. HAVE MOTHERS AND DAUGHTERS BANQUET. Invite mothers and daughters of your church and acquaintance. Have waiters dressed in UNION SIGNAL costume made of the pages of the paper, two for an apron, one for a cap, one each for cuffs. Paste quotations from THE UNION SIGNAL on blank cards for place cards. Have some of the young girls give recitations or readings from THE UNION SIGNAL, following dinner. Take silver offering. Only $4.50 need be raised!

3. START A "YEAR OF DIMES." Ask each member to give a dime or multiple of a dime for some certain week of the year, thus making a present to the three officers, of THE UNION SIGNAL for that one week. Get forty-five people to do the same, and the amount will be raised. Many will give two or three dimes, undoubtedly, which will make it unnecessary to ask forty-five people. $4.50 is all you need.

4. IF IN A COUNTRY DISTRICT, have an egg shower, asking each member to bring as her contribution two or three eggs. With the funds derived from the sale of the eggs, subscribe for THE UNION SIGNAL for the Trio-Team. You can easily raise the $4.50.

5. OLD PAPERS FOR NEW. Ask every member to save her old newspapers and paper of every kind, and use the funds to subscribe for THE UNION SIGNAL for the Trio-Team. Just four dollars and fifty cents is all that is required!

6. SERIES OF SIGNAL TEAS. Have series of teas at members' homes, to discuss current events and temperance, peace, and social welfare work. Give to each guest a Conversation card, upon which will be pasted an incident or bit of news from THE UNION SIGNAL, as a suggestive topic of conversation. Have a basket at the door for silver offering, to be used for subscriptions to THE UNION SIGNAL for the Trio-Team. You'll get the $4.50!

7. POUND PARTIES. Let members invite their husbands, brothers, sons and men friends. A conspicuous pair of scales, decorated with white ribbon and flags, should stand at the door, and everybody must be weighed and pay one-half cent for every pound, all to go into the fund for the Trio-Team subscriptions. A few heavy-weight guests will insure the $4.50.

8. HOW MUCH IS YOUR NAME WORTH? Have a social evening, and request everybody to give one penny for every letter in his or her name, no initials allowed. Invite a few Russian or Polish friends with names a yard long and you'll find you'll have more than $4.50.

9. MENDING BEES. For a union in a town of some size, especially where there are factories in which many girls are employed, advertise at Y. W. C. A. and Y. M. C. A. headquarters that mending will be done at a reasonable price by the W. C. T. U. at its regular meetings. This will be doing a good turn to the young men and women away from home, and will bring the $4.50 you need. While engaged in the Mending Bee, discussion of civic, state and national affairs can be carried on with profit and pleasure.

10. CANDY SALES are a "sweet way" to secure the $4.50 for the Trio-Team.

Quick as a flash, Miss Blake followed. Archie, totally unaware that he was being pursued, reached the landing and flew into the room at the left.

Miss Blake paused before the open door through which he had disappeared. On a broken lounge sprawled a drunken woman, her coarse, yellow hair half concealing her fat, flushed face. On a sagging table leaned a rat-faced man who gnawed ravenously at a dry bone.

Then from another door unexpectedly appeared Archie. Defiant shame flared in his eyes.

"You go 'way! You go 'way! You—come spyin'! Just to see what you can see! You go 'way!" And before she realized what was happening, Miss Blake found herself facing a securely locked door.

A woman, attracted by the noise, stepped out into the hall.

"It was Archie Sullivan—I'm his teacher."

"Yes, I know. Poor Archie." In the woman's voice sounded a note of compassion.

"They're no good—his people. They've been here only a month but the landlord's told them to move. His mother—well—you saw what she is. And his father is a thief. Archie's the best of the three. Not a word will he hear against them, though. But the way they treat him! You ought to see his back, all black and blue from the beatings they've given him."

A light began to dawn on Miss Blake—the false addresses, the apparent lack of interest, the dull despair, the bitter defiance. She decided to see Mr. Ogden that very evening.

A few weeks later, the principal stepped into the fifth grade room to inquire about Archie Sullivan. Miss Blake beamed with enthusiasm. "Why, you would never know the child. Since he's been living with the Brownes, he's wonderfully changed! They're fond of him, they're thinking of adopting him! And his school-work! Improving all the time. Come over to the window. There he is, playing tag with those boys." Mr. Ogden saw a happy, healthy child racing merrily along the yard.

"What a change!" Then the smile faded from his kindly face. "That shows what a good home will do. And there are too many Archies and too few homes."

"Yes, there are," thoughtfully returned Miss Blake, " but at any rate, we've done something for one Archie."

OUR SUPREME TASK

Our supreme task today is to arouse the indifferent and apathetic citizen to a sense of our great national danger of law violations; to bring speedily to the bar of justice the law-breaking brewer, distiller, manufacturer, wholesaler, and retailer of liquors; to apprehend and convict the smuggler, the rum runner, the moonshiner, and his numerous confederates; to rebuke by righteous indignation the shameless propaganda for the nullification of our prohibition laws and the undermining of respect for all law.

Law, including the prohibition law, is the very basis of the stability and prosperity of our country.

The men who are striking at the prohibition law do not realize that they are striking at their own property interests; that if they should accomplish what they wish and bring the prohibition law crashing to the ground, they would bring down also the fabric of which it is a part. The Constitution would become meaningless. Popular elections, so long held sacred in their results, would become contemptible. The spirit of anarchy would be let loose and no man would know whether or not he might call his property his own, or whether the safety of his wife and children could be assured by the law and the instruments of the law which had been flaunted and condemned.

Prohibition was adopted by the greatest majority any constitutional provision ever received. It was adopted by the method prescribed by the makers of the Constitution. It is an integral part of the Constitution itself. It can not be nullified without tearing the very heart out of our system of government.

—Representative A. P. Nelson in speech before Congress

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

GIVE US CONSTRUCTIVE LEADERSHIP ON CAPITOL HILL!—WAR APPROPRIATIONS CERTAIN TO BE REDUCED—NEW SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA—NEWBERRY DECISION BY THE SENATE—MORE JUDGES NEEDED

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

THE FOUR-PACT TREATY

The following is from the bulletin edited by Mr. F. B. Libby, secretary of the National Council for Limitation of Armament. The National Council is a clearing house for forty-two national organizations—twenty-nine affiliated and thirteen cooperating.

GIVE US CONSTRUCTIVE LEADERSHIP ON CAPITOL HILL!

"'HEAVEN FORBID THAT THE GENUINE LOVERS OF PEACE IN AMERICA SHOULD SPEND MONTHS IN A VAIN EFFORT TO DEFEAT ANOTHER TREATY BECAUSE IT IS NOT PERFECT, WHEN THEY MIGHT BE LEADING AMERICA IN LEADING THE WORLD TOWARDS PERMANENT PEACE. GIVE US CONSTRUCTIVE STATESMANSHIP ON CAPITOL HILL! LEADERSHIP, NOT OBSTRUCTION, IS WHAT THE PEOPLE WANT.

THE PLANS NOW INITIATED FOR PREPARATION FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE CONTEMPLATE A MORE COMPLETE STATE OF PREPAREDNESS THAN AT ANY PREVIOUS PERIOD IN THE PEACE-TIME HISTORY OF OUR COUNTRY.'

"Thus wrote our Secretary of War in his report to the President for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1921 and published on December 8th. He continues:

"THE YOUNG MEN of the country must train themselves to be fitted into their places in the National Reserve. The INDUSTRIES must prepare to co-operate in wartime production. The American people have started along this path and they cannot afford to turn back.

'THE ENORMOUS DISBURSEMENTS IN THE RIVALRIES OF ARMAMENTS MANIFESTLY CONSTITUTE THE GREATER PART OF THE ENCUMBRANCE UPON ENTERPRISE AND NATIONAL PROSPERITY; AND AVOIDABLE OR EXTRAVAGANT EXPENSE OF THIS NATURE IS NOT ONLY WITHOUT ECONOMIC JUSTIFICATION BUT IS A CONSTANT MENACE TO THE PEACE OF THE WORLD RATHER THAN AN ASSURANCE OF ITS PRESERVATION.'

"Thus spoke our President in his invitation to the Washington Conference and in the address with which he opened it he went further:

'IN SOBEREST REFLECTION THE WORLD'S HUNDREDS OF MILLIONS WHO PAY IN PEACE AND DIE IN WAR WISH THIER STATESMEN TO TURN THE EXPENDITURES FOR DESTRUCTION INTO THE MEANS OF CONSTRUCTION, AIMED AT A HIGHER STATE FOR THOSE WHO LIVE AND FOLLOW AFTER.'

"Our Secretary of War has done his duty. It is his misfortune that by the nature of his position he must view the world from a militaristic standpoint. Distrusting all nations he must recommend military measures that will make us unquestionably secure in case of military attacks. His voice is destined to be of diminishing influence henceforth in the life and thought of America. It is the broader standpoint for which the President of the United States stands that is destined to prevail. The sooner a Department of Defense replaces the War and Navy Departments, the sooner our sincere purpose to lead the world in the outlawry of war will become effectual.

"The Hearst Press has been attacking the Conference from every possible angle. It has preached fear and suspicion of Great Britain, of Japan, of Continental Europe; at the same time it has lauded the position taken by the militarists of France and of Japan as setting America a wise example. It has preached a greater Navy and a stronger Army. It has nailed its "preparedness" policy to the masthead by printing it as a permanent platform across its editorial page.

"The Committee on General Information has tabulated the expressed wishes of the American people concerning the reduction of armaments up to January 6th. While many of those who have registered their opposition to the limitation of armaments are not readers of the Hearst Press and on the other hand many of its readers may be classed as inarticulate, the following figures are nevertheless significant:

Endorsing Limitation of Armaments	11,945,770
For limitation with caution, ..	11,641
Against limitation, ...	11,350
For increase in present naval strength	7,379"

WAR APPROPRIATIONS CERTAIN TO BE REDUCED

The sober expectation of America that the Army and Navy appropriations will be cut down drastically as the result of the Washington Conference is voiced in a message from the Boston Chamber of Commerce "comprising a membership of more than 7,000 persons and business concerns" recently received by President Harding. Expressing gratification in the achievements of the Conference as "brilliantly justifying" the people's hopes and indicating the desirability of frequent conferences like this to secure world peace and world justice, the message goes on to say that the Boston Chamber of Commerce "welcomes the certainty that much of the cost of preparation for future wars may be diverted to the arts of peace; that adequate relief for those who still suffer from their participation in the world war may be more readily provided; that general education may be advanced; that public health may be further safeguarded; and that the excessive taxation which hampers industry, hinders business development, and reduces the purchase power of wages may be cut down."

When Congress has cut enough from the Army and Navy appropriations to provide adequate relief for our crippled veterans; to make a measurable increase in our national appropriation for education, that we may meet the illiteracy of America which the war disclosed; to take necessary steps in the promotion of public health—and the medical examinations for the draft proved conclusively the need; and at the same time to cut our taxes until they cease to be "excessive", the world will know that America means business in the limitation of armaments.

NEW SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA

George Wharton Pepper, junior United States Senator from Pennsylvania by appointment of Governor Sproul to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Boies Penrose, took the oath of office on Tuesday.

Mr. Pepper is an able lawyer, standing high in his profession, and has been connected with the University of Pennsylvania for years. He stands for good citizenship and from all over the state comes word that he has the respect and confidence of the people.

NEWBERRY DECISION BY THE SENATE

The text of the resolution by which Mr. Newberry's title to his seat was given and which dismissed the charges made in the contest filed against him by Henry Ford follows:

"1. That the contest of Henry Ford against Truman H. Newberry be, and is hereby, dismissed.

"2. That Truman H. Newberry is hereby declared to be a duly elected Senator from the state of Michigan for the term of six years commencing the 4th day of March, 1919, and is entitled to hold his seat in the Senate of the United States.

"3. That whether the amount expended in this (Michigan) primary was $165,000 as was fully reported, or openly asknowledged, or whether there were some few thousand dollars in excess, the amount expended was in either case too large, much larger than ought to have been expended.

"The expenditure of such excessive sum in behalf of a candidate, either with or without his knowledge and consent, being contrary to sound public policy, harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate and dangerous to the perpetuity of a free government, such expenditures are hereby severely condemned and disapproved."

The resolution was passed by a vote of 46 to 41.

MORE JUDGES NEEDED

The Senate Judiciary Committee is considering the measure which has passed the House to relieve the crowded Federal court dockets through an increased number of judges.

Before both Committees of Congress, the Chief Justice and the Attorney General have pleaded for the creation of a number of additional judgeships, in order that congested dockets in all centers of population may be cleared and that administration of justice may no longer be impeded.

Chief Justice Taft recently said:

"There is no field of governmental action so important to the people as our courts. There is nothing in those courts so essential to the doing of justice as the prompt dispatch of business and the elimination from procedure of such requirements as will defeat the ends of justice through technicality and delay."

METHODIST BOARD OF PROHIBITION, TEMPERANCE, AND PUBLIC MORALS REPORTS ON RESULTS OF PROHIBITION

The results of prohibition in this country, secured in an investigation covering several months, through official channels and direct inquiry, have been announced by the Rev. Dr. Deets Pickett, research secretary of the Board of Prohibition, Temperance and Public Morals of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The organization of the church was used as one of the agencies of information, which was obtained from 20,000 heads of churches and numerous leaders of the 10,000,000 lay adherents. The statement includes no figures not personally verified.

The conclusions are:

1. Prohibition is excellently enforced in nine-tenths of the area of the country and in the remainder is sufficiently well enforced to be a very great improvement over the license system.

2. There has been an enormous decrease in the consumption of liquor, a slump of not less than eighty-five and possibly more than ninety per cent. This has resulted in a very large decrease in the number of arrests for drunkenness and in a very considerable increase in the purchasing power of the poor and of the skilled and unskilled laborers. In San Francisco, California, prohibition decreased arrests for drunkenness in its first year of operation from 17,354 to 1,814. In Los Angeles, of the same state, the decrease was from 15,830 to 2,589. In Boston, it was from 52,662 to 16,487. In Baltimore, in the last wet October, there were 1,165 arrests for drunkenness and in the first dry October, 119. We have similar reports from the heads of police of Washington, St. Paul, Lincoln, Galveston, St. Louis, and cities in all parts of the country, including such industrial centers as Gary and Lowell.

The fact of increased purchasing power is attested by signed statements of the secretaries of chambers of commerce, real estate dealers, furniture and musical instrument dealers and merchants of many kinds, doing business in many cities.

3. There has also been a large decrease in petty crime, in which drink is commonly supposed to be a frequent causative factor. In Boston, prohibition brought about a decrease in the number of cases of assault from 2,127 to 1,675 in one year. In St. Louis, petit larceny declined from 6,167 to 3,503. In Buffalo, there was a large decrease in arrests for petit larceny, grand larceny, vagrancy and robbery. These citations are only typical of practically all American cities.

4. There has also been a decrease in more serious crimes in many cities, although our information on this phase is as yet too incomplete for conclusions. In certain cities a few crime charges of serious nature have slightly increased, but in far more instances there has been a decline. The wet propagandists have spoken much of a crime wave in New York, for instance. I have it on the authority of the Commissioner of Police of the city of New York, that in 1918 there were 11,611 burglaries, and in 1920 only 6,830. He makes similar statements as to commissions of crime of serious nature on other charges.

5. The statistics cited heretofore have referred to cities. Even better results have been obtained in rural and small town districts. In New York state as a whole, on June thirtieth, 1919, the last wet day, there were 11,016 inmates of penal institutions throughout the state. One year later there were 9,145. Still more significant is the fact that commitments declined from 59,033 to 26,145. We sent a questionnaire to typical counties throughout the country (a very large number of them) during the present year and found that the population of the jails in those counties was fewer by thousands than for the last wet year.

6. There has been a startling decrease in poverty and financial distress. For the first time in history, the United States has passed through a period of sharp deflation with almost no hunger or suffering from exposure. The hospitals have been relieved of the alcoholic and have been able to give more attention to maternity and similar cases. In Philadelphia in six months of the last wet year, there were 1,184 cases of alcoholism in the general hospitals and in the same months of the next year, 276. In the famous Hadley Rescue Mission of New York City, there were 42,415 visitors seeking food, shelter or other help in the last six wet months and 19,691 in the first six dry months. Similar reports have been received from Cincinnati and other cities, while charity workers tell illuminating stories of changed conditions.

7. The effect upon child welfare is indicated by the statement of the largest manufacturer of milk bottles in the United States that under prohibition his business promptly increased by thirty-five per cent.

8. Warning must be offered against general, unsupported statements on the part of alcohol propagandists. It is frequently stated by them that there is in the United States enormous illicit distillation, that nearly every family makes alcohol. Obviously, this is simply an expression of opinion. In America, only a few families of German extraction know how to make palatable beer. Whisky, illicitly produced, is so nearly non-potable that only habitual alcoholics can consume it. Private distillation and brewing, while it worries the prohibition officers by necessitating many arrests, is an insignificant factor. It is found principally among sub-populations, illiterates or uninformed, and will disappear in time. Enforcement of the law is encountering only those difficulties always attending police work in large American cities, having populations of a varied racial character. Certain very powerful interests in Pennsylvania, New York, and New Jersey, which have long thrived upon bad governments, soon learned that if prohibition continues and the saloon remains unavailable as an agency of corrupt politics, they will never again be free to loot the treasuries of the rich eastern cities. It is this evil political motive which inspires the propaganda against prohibition in America. Public sentiment in America is for the law, as is attested by elections in such supposedly wet strongholds as New Jersey, where the wet candidates have been overwhelmingly repudiated and the state's true sentiment expressed. Prohibition is a relative success now, and is on the road to complete success.

Brewers Can't Bribe

Chicago brewers are discovering that bribes do not pay. Charles A. Gregory, prohibition director for the state of Illinois, summoned fifty brewers to the Federal building, the other day, for a "talk." "I understand," said he, "that certain persons have been collecting money from you on the ground that you might thus obtain protection from the activities of Federal agents. Let me tell you that you are wasting your money. Whoever is caught violating prohibition regulations will be given the extreme penalty if we can bring it about."

Important Decisions

Decisions of broad importance in the enforcement of the prohibition law have been handed down in San Francisco by both the federal and state courts, says The Christian Science Monitor. The United States Circuit Court of Appeals rendered the decision that it is not necessary for prohibition agents to have search-warrants in searching business places in which liquor is believed to be concealed. Sentences of proprietors of so-called "soft drink" establishments, convicted in the courts of selling liquor, were confirmed, in connection with this decision. The Court of Appeals also decided that liquor is not merchandise, and does not have to be listed on a ship's manifest, if it is brought into this country. The court held that liquor is merchandise only when a permit for its importation has been given by the prohibition authorities. Liquor brought in without a permit can be seized as contraband, but the owner cannot be fined, according to another paragraph of this decision.

Physicians Favor Prohibition

The reports are still coming in from the physicians of the country who recently were sent a questionnaire on the therapeutic use of alcohol by the Journal of the American Medical Association. The majority of 13,316 physicians in nineteen states, representing all parts of the country, want neither whisky, beer nor wine. Only 2,668 of this number reported instances of suffering or death due to the enforcement of prohibition. The majority also declared in favor of restrictions in prescribing whisky, beer and wine.

United States Being Successfully Weaned Away From Whisky Bottle, Declares Commissioner Haynes

"Facts tell us that prohibition is being enforced, that there was less drunkenness in the United States last year, and that less liquor is being consumed in this country than ever before," was the statement given out by Federal Prohibition Commissioner Roy A. Haynes on his recent visit to Chicago to confer with the leaders of state and city upon the "cleanup" now in progress there. Major Haynes says that although some of them still cry for it, the forty-eight states are being successfully weaned away from the bottle of liquor. The commissioner expressed himself as pleased at the co-operation of the Chicago authorities in the fight against the bootleggers, who, he maintains, are criminals who prostitute statesmanship and debauch the citizenry.

CRUSADE MEMORIES

Anna Adams Gordon

At this season of the year come our memory days of the dauntless crusaders of the winter of 1873-74. Their daring courage, their persistent faith, their superb attack on the strongholds of the liquor traffic, forever will be the wonder feature in the drama of our great and victorious reform. Braving winter's snow and the chill of harsh criticism, went forth these women of the home and of the church. Their appeal to liquor sellers was voiced in fervent prayer and sacred song. Side by side in that remarkable crusade knelt the aged and the young. In many states, notably New York and Ohio, bands of "praying women" took part in "that whirlwind of the Lord," the women's temperance crusade.

"A Brief History of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union," issued by the publishing house at Evanston, Illinois, rightfully says: "There were many prophecies of the crusade. The first occurred about the year 1830 in the town of Auburn, N. Y., when Mrs. Delecta Barbour Lewis, the mother of Dr. Dio Lewis, led the Godly women of that little town in a warfare against the saloon in precisely the manner afterwards so familiar to the world.

"In 1858 a crusade was carried on with marvelous success by the women of Dixon, Illinois; another in the same year by the women of Battle Creek, Michigan. At Mattoon, Illinois, in 1871, a group of temperance women organized under the name, Temperance Legion, but when the National W. C. T. U. was formed, they became a Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

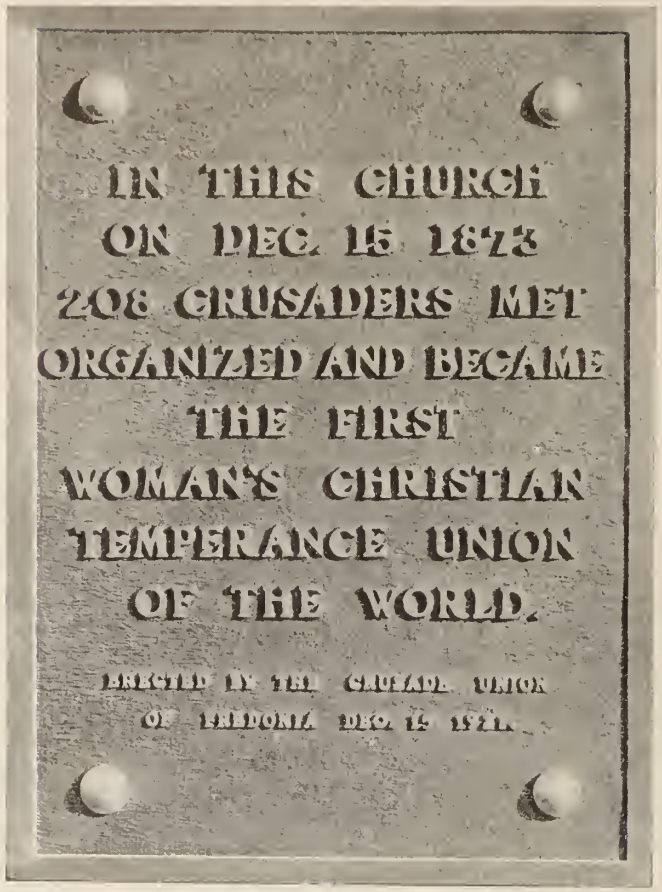
"In 1864 the women of East Weymouth, Massachusetts, organized a 'Woman's Temperance Union.' By a strange prophetic coincidence their badge was a bow of white ribbon, much larger than the bow of today. They labored personally with the saloon-keepers of the place until they either closed their saloons or left town. This society also established a strict boycott against all who patronized or favored the saloon. These women never disbanded, but wore their white bows until the small bow became the badge of the great national organization.

"These isolated events all prepared the way for the greater movement. The duration of the crusade proper did not exceed six months. Its results cannot be reduced to figures.

"The greatest result of the crusade was the awakening of the women of the country to a knowledge of the enormity of the liquor traffic and to a consciousness of their own ability to work for its overthrow."

After the crusade had passed away this consciousness took concrete form in the organization of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Women discovered the deep-rooted strength of the organized liquor traffic and that to overthrow it they must organize for a long campaign of education, agitation and legislation. Christian women throughout the nation "united for the protection of the home, the abolition of the liquor traffic and the triumph of Christ's Golden Rule in custom and in law." The call for this organization was sent out from Chautauqua, N. Y., in August of 1874. The convention was held in the Second Presbyterian Church, in Cleveland, Ohio, November 18, 19 and 20, 1874, and the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union was then organized.

The stirring events of the Ohio crusade are well known to the world, but many of our present day workers are not aware that to Fredonia, N. Y., belongs the high distinction of responding on December 14, 1873, to Dr. Dio Lewis' inspired suggestion that women should enter upon a crusade against the direst foe of their homes. On that eventful date, cultured women, two hundred and eight in number, with prayer and song marched two by two into the saloons and hotel bar-rooms of Fredonia. What is more, they organized, the following day, under the name, Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and are justly proud of thus antedating by nearly a year the name adopted at the organizing convention of the National W. C. T. U., November, 1874, in Cleveland, Ohio.



Memorial Tablet in Fredonia (N. Y.) Baptist Church

On the forty-eighth anniversary of the organization of the Fredonia crusaders under the name, Woman's Christian Temperance Union, it was my happy privilege to help unveil a beautiful bronze memorial in the Fredonia Baptist Church. The president of the Crusade Union, Mrs. Grace E. Mercer, assisted in lifting from the tablet the folds of Old Glory. The entire day was given over to a fine and fitting celebration, which included an afternoon meeting in the Baptist Church, a banquet at the White Inn and an evening meeting, at which time the tablet was presented to the church by Mrs. Grace E. Mercer and accepted by the pastor, Rev. C. L. Rhoades. Mrs. Mercer furnished a complete history of the movement. Mrs. Katherine Warner, county president, Miss Lizzie M. Perkins, first vice-president of Chautauqua County W. C. T. U., and many others participated in the exercises of the day. Mrs. Frances W. Graham added greatly to the joy of the occasion by her service of song and speech. The banquet at the White Inn, with Miss Mara Wilcox as presiding officer and Mrs. Mary Frost Popoff as toastmistress, was delightfully unique in its program which toasted "The Birthday," "The Cakes," "The Candles," and "The Gift." Loving, grateful words of appreciation were spoken of Mrs. Esther McNeil, for many years the president of the Fredonia Crusade Union. Mrs. Phoebe Potter, one of the few surviving crusaders—the indomitable two hundred and eight—offered prayer at the afternoon meeting.

New York state has reason to congratulate itself that it figured largely in the spectacular, spiritual uprising of the Women's Crusade. Also that from old Chautauqua camp ground, at the time of a Sunday school assembly, the call went out for the organizing convention of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Happy are we all that the triumphant crusade spirit reverently abides in the work and workers of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

> Born of such a visitation of God's spirit as the world has not known since tongues of fire sat upon the wondering group at Pentecost, cradled in a faith high as the hope of a saint, and deep as the depths of a drunkard's despair, and baptized in the beauty of holiness, the Crusade determined the ultimate goal of its teachable child, the W. C. T. U., which has one steadfast aim, and that none other than the regnancy of Christ, not in form, but in fact; not in substance, but in essence; not ecclesiastically, but truly in the hearts of men.

AMERICANIZATION—A LINK IN THE SOCIAL CHAIN

Culla J. Vayhinger, National Director Americanization

A Spanish-American town in the southwestern part of the country has a section known as the Old Pueblo. It is the favorite haunt of the artist that he may paint the black-shawled women and the gaily dressed men. Passing along the narrow street, one walks on the verandas in front of the flat roofed adobe houses, and looking in at the open door, sees the family, the scant furnishings, and the chickens! Often there is a glimpse of the patio, or inner courtyard where some one is always at the tub and washboard, while the children crawl over the freshly swept dirt floor, or scamper among the stock stabled a few yards away. Though the houses lack windows and floors, there is little litter or garbage, and the thick adobe walls insure comfort in summer and in winter.

A struggling Spanish mission church in this section finds many obstacles to overcome. The mission worker, seeing little need of Americanization but much need of Christianization, did not welcome very cordially the Americanization worker. She was persuaded to allow us to accompany her upon a round of calls. All conversations were carried on in Spanish, but several women and one girl expressed a desire to learn English.

We called upon them regularly for several days. As we spoke no Spanish it was necessary for them to learn English. In four lessons some of the women had acquired a vocabulary of nearly a hundred words, had learned to greet us in English, to extend to us the courtesies of the home, and to give us a "good bye, come again" when we left.

The case of the young girl who wished to learn English was most pathetic. Little by little we learned the story of the family. Hearing that the men of the city were contemplating the abandonment of the Associated Charities work, and that one paper of the city was using its influence for its continuance, we told our story to that paper, and the next Sunday the following editorial appeared in its columns:

" 'There abideth (in this world) faith, hope, and charity — and the greatest of these is charity.' That was said centuries ago, and the succeeding years have proved the truth of the assertion. When faith is dead and the radiance of hope is dimmed to a last feeble flicker, charity still is able to restore with her sympathy and with her more material offerings the love of life that is so strongly rooted in all of us.

"In Elysian Grove in the Old Pueblo lives a family bound even in heart-breaking need by ties of real love and a sense of filial and fraternal duty. There is a mother, blind, deaf—aged far beyond her years by the burdens which life has put upon her. There is a sister, thirteen years old, on whose slender shoulders falls the daily work of their poor home, and the care of—seven other children, all but one younger than herself. This little mother, though herself only a child, cooks and sweeps, washes and mends from morning until night, watching over the younger kiddies, kissing their bumps and bruises, dressing them, feeding them, soothing their childish troubles, and cuddling them at night in the one old bed, that they may sleep warmly and peacefully.

"Then—there is a fourteen-year-old boy—the man of the family in every way but years. Unbelievable is the way in which he supports this crowded household; almost equally unbelievable is the sense of duty within him, his responsibility so keen, and his regard so poignantly tender. And this is the way in which he earns the few dollars which are this family's only means of support: In the dark, cold, zero hours of earliest dawn he awakens from none too pleasant dreams, and taking his lunch of hard, dry bread, with an old horse and battered wagon, he goes far into the mountains armed only with an old axe. He stays in the hills three days and two nights, cutting wood, and when his wagon is full he comes back to Tucson and sells his load for a pitifully small sum. Long days of jogging over trailless hills, long nights before a dreary camp fire, wrapped in baukets insuflicient to protect him from wind and weather, with only the stars for a canopy and the gaunt old horse to stand guard—it isn't an ideal existence for the lad of fourteen, who ought to be playing football with other boys, eating his three square meals, studying his lessons, and at night slumbering dreamlessly in a nice, warm bed. And yet this little fellow doesn't complain, he doesn't shirk. His mother and his little sisters are his to care for. Daddy is dead. He is the man, and he is being a man with more earnestness and with better results than ninety per cent of the full-grown male population of the city.

"There is more to tell of this one little family in direct want of everything but that one thing which, if supported by even the fewest of material blessings, makes happiness supreme—love. But surely even this little story ought to bring to the minds of all who read it thoughts of Charity and her wonderful work among just such families as this. And it ought, too, to teach ever-generous Charity to discriminate just a little in her beautiful work—when it is not possible for her to heal every hurt and supply every need. In the great fields of Charity's endeavor some are honestly, truly more deserving than others, and while it seems wrong to choose favorites, surely, in simple justice, there is license for discrimination and choice of those most deserving of succor—first.

" 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, ye have done it unto Me.' No one in the world doubts the beautiful truth of that. But to choose first the best from the 'least of these'—surely that would be as it should be. Is it not so?"

As a result of this editorial, the next day a woman brought some clothing for the children and a kind hearted man ordered twenty-five dollars' worth of supplies charged to his account. In courtesy to the mission worker, she was given the pleasure of carrying these blessings to the family. The children are now in her Sunday school, and she has seen the beauty of co-operative service on the part of Americanization and mission worker and will continue to labor with the W. C. T. U. in aid of the Spanish-speaking women of the city. The Americanization program of our organization does not add new burdens to Christian service but is a link between church, charity, child welfare, social morality and educational agencies, all of which are seeking the uplift of community life and a greater, happier, holier America.

Christian America, for the writing of whose history God has always held the pen-hand, has had cast into her lap people of more than thirty nationalities, speaking fifty languages and dialects. They are scattered over the country—not a state but has some of these new-comers. To make of the women Christian Americans is our task. I am not responsible for making them ALL Christian Americans, but I am responsible for doing one Christian American woman's part in this effort, so I will—

First, visualize to the ones with whom I come in contact, by my conduct and life, the true Christian American.

Second, I will help at least one foreign woman by being a friend and neighbor to her.

If no foreign-born are within my reach, I will at least help to interest others in this great work by distributing literature and preparing programs on the subject. I will help the workers among them by praying for them, making garments and other supplies for their use, and by helping to finance the work.

Our Americanization Field Workers

Miss Charlotte Fraser has been in the New England states for three months where she has been doing wonderful work. Mrs. Althea G. Quimby, president of the Maine W. C. T. U., says of her efforts in her state: "We all lost our hearts to her as she spoke with such feeling and earnestness on the subject so dear to her. She has really helped our work in a splendid way. May we not have her again in April or May?" The same report comes from every place she visited. A minister heard her deliver three addresses, then wrote: "If a daughter of mine could speak like that in a field to which God had called her, I would be the happiest father in all the world." She spends a part of January in Worcester, Mass., where she will help reopen an abandoned Center in one of the neediest fields of that industrial city.

Miss Amy Spalding has visited Indiana, Iowa, Kansas and is now in Nebraska. While in Ohio she helped to establish the work in Cleveland where the Center is located in one of the most notoriously bad halls in the city. She attended the state convention and won the hearts of the women of the Crusade state. In Iowa, she spoke to organizations of every kind, including Commercial Clubs, and the women all said, "We were so proud of the way she represented the W. C. T. U." In breezy Kansas, they were so enthusiastic concerning her work that they tried to keep her in the state. A leading lawyer of Kansas City said, "Hers was the most logical, convincing speech to which I have listened."

Miss Theo Whiting is in the far southwest. Her work in New Mexico was particularly appreciated by the state superintendent of Public Instruction. Little attention had been paid to Americanization work. She spoke at the state teachers' convention and helped to formulate the program for the ensuing year's work. This work will be productive of much good because it has started a force which will continue in the state after she enters another.

We are happy and thankful for these splendid young women who are giving their time and efforts to this field under the W. C. T. U. program. May the God of all Grace keep them in His Spirit that they may be used of Him for His glory!

Incidents of Americanization Work

Theo Whiting

In Stanislaus county, California, I found few night schools and only latent interest in the work of Americanization. We gathered together for a conference the leaders in the churches (Protestant and Catholic) the W. R. C., the D. A. R., the K. of C., the Y. M. C. A., the women's organizations and the schools. The superintendent of the latter told us, "The foreigners do not want to be taught. Only four have asked for classes." We women called upon a few of these people, urging them to speak at the meeting. Of three women, all Portuguese, the first, unmarried, when told she might learn English and become a citizen, said eagerly, "Where? How? When?" The second, who came here as a stepmother and had learned what she knew from her stepchildren, said, "How I wish I could have gone to school. If I had been even to day-school with my children it would have helped. It is so hard to learn alone. Now I like it better." The third said, "I vote. My husband a citizen."—this very proudly—"I want to study so I can vote right."

In a few weeks the twenty-five required names were obtained and the school opened. The board plans to extend the work throughout the county.

The judge of the district court said to me, "Who sent you here? The Federal government? The state government?" I replied: "The Woman's Christian Temperance Union." "Well, they could do nothing better," was his answer.

I could relate many incidents concerning Tucson, Arizona. In one "case" which I have been trying to help, the father is dead, the mother blind and partly deaf. A son of fourteen earns the living for the entire family by a three days' trip for wood. A girl of thirteen is housekeeper and cook, and four younger children are out of school. There is no comb nor wash-cloth in the house, which has a dirt floor and no windows, and few articles of furniture! The mother sits all day on the side of the bed. The needs: Food, clothing, school life, instruction for the girl at home, and friendship for the mother.

My visits are appreciated. In the limited time I could give to the work I introduced the family to the charity board and school authorities and enlisted a ninth grade girl who lives very near, to teach the thirteen-year-old daughter.

The Mexican women say, "No savvy English." They are willing to learn and they have been taught in three lessons a vocabulary of eighty to one hundred words, can read Bible stories, know how to invite a guest into their home and feel less timid about talking with Americans.

Intelligent, educated Mexicans, used to business life in Mexico, are unable to find work in America because they cannot speak the English language. The wife goes out washing. A girl of ten keeps house. They live in a tent—no bed, stove outside, cooking utensils, clothes, food hanging on the trees. The friendship of a W. C. T. U. woman is needed to help the man find a job, the wife to learn English and to make an American home.

Workers are greatly needed; the harvest is ripe. Here is real home mission work. Hearts are hungry for friendship, for the love of Christ shown in our love for humanity.

Such are our opportunities to teach Christian American ideals when the times are hardest.

Christmas Eve at Ellis Island

Culla J. Vayhinger

Christmas eve was a wonderful time for the more than one thousand newcomers at Ellis Island. Our own Mrs. Ella A. Boole was chairman of the committee and nothing was left undone that could in any way add to the happiness of those detained there. The steamship companies and the organizations connected with the work on the Island placed money in the hands of the committee with which to buy gifts. Great quantities of stuffed animals, dolls, toys, hair ribbons, handkerchiefs, wash-cloths, and soap had been sent in by the Presbyterian Church. The W. C. T. U. had made black sateen bags for the seven hundred women, and in each had been placed a handkerchief, a cake of soap, a wash-cloth, and an apron, or a string of beads. The little girls all received dolls, the boys toys and picture books. Every one, young and old, received an orange, each child a large stick of candy and each adult a half-pound of milk chocolate.

Commissioner Todd has just had a fine new pipe organ installed as a memorial to John S. Kenneday, the great philanthropist, and had arranged a most wonderful program of music.

One thousand people had been sent away from the Island through the ruling at Washington that those detained as excess quota would be released on three months' bond. A very large number of boys and girls, three hundred men, mostly bolshevists, all of whom are awaiting deportation, were not permitted to come into the large room so beautifully decorated for the occasion, but gifts were sent to them.

The immense Christmas tree occupied the center of the room and as these detained ones came into the joy and beauty of this hallowed time, they forgot their loneliness and sorrows and were conscious only of the spirit that led strangers to leave their own firesides on this happy night and come to play "Santa" to those from other shores. They became "no more strangers and foreigners but brothers".

From this time on, this service of love at Ellis Island will be one of the important divisions of work of the Americanization department of the National W. C. T. U., and we hope another Christmas will bring to each of us a little more joy because of the privilege of ministering to these strangers. Our field of usefulness is to be enlarged by the addition of an assistant, who will do necessary clerical work.

The Field of Service Just Where You Are

A young woman read the story of the lives of some of the worthy missionaries in China and her heart was stirred until she felt that she was chosen of God to that field of Christian service. One night she prayed until she was ready to say "yes" to the call, and then retiring very happy in her surrendered will, she had a dream: She met the Christ and was radiantly happy in the thought of her new field of service. "I died for Lee Sam in the Main street laundry, and for his little wife; for Tam Chiu and his wife in the Chinese store: have you ever told them about Me?" He said. She hung her head in shame as she remembered that she passed the two places almost every day and had never been interested enough to step inside to speak with them of the Christian life. She failed to see the duty and opportunity right at her door.

CHILD WELFARE

Elizabeth A. Perkins, National Director

MANY DEPARTMENT PLANS EQUALLY PRACTICABLE FOR CITY AND RURAL UNIONS

HOW MANY MEMBERS OF YOUR UNION are Big Sisters to Expectant Mothers?

During the Ohio state W. C. T. U. convention, recently held in Toledo, one-hundred-and-eighty women marched into the convention hall, carrying articles belonging to a layette or a mother's comfort kit. Each represented a member of the Lucas county W. C. T. U. who had promised to be a Big Sister to an Expectant Mother. Can you imagine a more practical or tender demonstration of the Child Welfare work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union?

The unions in Lucas county have made the layettes and mother's comfort kits, the names of the Big Sisters to Expectant Mothers have been given to physicians and nurses, and already these women have responded to many calls for help.

The term Big Sister is an old and dear one, but the phrase Big Sister to the Expectant Mother has been coined by the Child Welfare department of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, to indicate a part of its program of work in assisting the expectant mother, and lessening maternity and infant mortality.

This plan was originated two years ago by the state W. C. T. U. Child Welfare superintendent of Missouri, and since that time, urged throughout the United States by the national director and state superintendents, has proven a blessed and practical work in both city and rural communities, and unions everywhere are pushing it with great enthusiasm and zeal. A demonstration similar to the one in Toledo might be made at most state and county conventions, and would well exemplify the work already being done.

To be a Big Sister to an Expectant Mother does not necessarily involve giving financial assistance, but sisterly love and attention, in full measure, or, united with these, emergency help as the particular case requires.

You may be a Big Sister to the Expectant Mother who sits in the pew next to yours in church; she may live in a beautiful house, but she is far from her girlhood home and friends—a stranger among you—and she will like a Big Sister.

You may be a Big Sister to the Expectant Mother who lives just across the street, or a short way down the block, and who for a little time will be almost a shut-in. Perhaps, you will help make the tiny clothes and will loan her books on motherhood. If you live out in the country, you may find an Expectant Mother a mile or two away. You have never "neighbored" with her, but just now, how lonely she is! Why not begin to make friends with her while her heart is tender; if you invite her, she may go with you to the Mothers' Meeting.

There will be many calls, and many, many opportunities to be a Big Sister to the Expectant Mother who is poor, who has nothing ready for the little one, who knows nothing about prenatal care, and very little about infant care. Physicians, social workers, and district nurses will furnish the names of those who need this material help as well as friendly comfort. The W. C. T. U. Big Sister will be welcomed as she comes in the spirit of the Master and as a real friend.

The local unions are asked to make the layettes and the mother's comfort kits. The former will be made of inexpensive material, for frequently they must be given and not merely loaned. The mother's comfort kit will contain all that is needed to make the patient comfortable and conditions sanitary.

After the great ordeal is over, the mother's comfort kit will be returned to the union, sponges and pads replenished, linen and other articles washed and sterilized, and all will be made ready again for a further mission of love and service.

After the baby's birth, the Big Sister, when needed, will watch over the little one, attend to birth registration in states where the law is not enforced, and will help and advise the mother, that the baby may be properly nourished and cared for.

The Gospel of Christ's love should shine in both word and deed; a Bible or Testament may be given the mother, with the baby's name and date of birth written therein.

What a great opportunity for service! The mother's love for her child will make the service a welcome one, and the Big Sister to the Expectant Mother a trusted friend. More and more, will Our Organized Mother Love be known and loved.

My Promised Babe

O little babe, growing beneath my heart,
O little life, of my own a part!
God grant me wisdom as the days flit by,
And strength and courage as thy birth draws nigh.

Wisdom to shape thy little growing mind,
To make thee loving, generous and kind;
That thou may'st turn, when older, to the right
As eagerly as flowers to the light.

Wisdom to think such thoughts as Mary thought,
With love and purity and reverence fraught;
That this fair soul that God is sending me
May like unto the little Christ-Child be.

God grant us more of love and trust and grace
To make our home for thee a fitting place.
Then earth will be so much the more like heaven,
Because to us a little child is given.

When Are Your Congressional Primaries?

One of the objectives upon which the anti-prohibition associations are focusing their attention is the election of a Congress which will repeal or modify the Volstead Prohibition Act. In at least ten states the primaries to nominate candidates for Congress will be held in the spring or early summer. The antis are endeavoring to make the people believe that prohibition is a failure; that the law cannot be enforced, and that the only way out of what they term the "present dilemma" is to elect a Congress that will replace the Volstead Act by a law providing for the manufacture and sale of wine and beer.

The duty confronts each one of us of ascertaining without delay who is being considered for Congress from our district, and of investigating and carefully scrutinizing the record of this man, and getting from him a definite statement as to his attitude on national prohibition. If he cannot show a clean slate, someone who can be depended upon to vote right must be nominated in his place at the coming primaries, and the wholehearted support of the voters of his district secured for him.

"Blame It On Prohibition"

There has been a decided tendency on the part of pro-liquor papers to make prohibition responsible for all the unpleasant and reprehensible events of the past year. Labor troubles and the crime wave, according to that section of the press, were due to the prohibitory law, which paved the way for a regime of lawlessness and disorder. In fact, "Blame it on Prohibition" seems to have been the slogan of our opponents, and too many people who get their opinions from the newspaper they happen to read, have accepted the explanation.

Intelligent students of the occurrences of the past twelve months realize the folly of such conclusions, for the crime wave that has swept over the United States has been world-wide in extent, and has wrought as great, if not greater, havoc in countries other than ours. As to labor troubles, the elimination of the saloon has greatly lessened the violence and suffering that have heretofore complicated such situations.

There are, however, certain happenings of the past year that we frankly admit should be "blamed on prohibition." For instance, 1921, we are told by at least thirty-seven life insurance companies, has been the healthiest year in the history of our country. We will not be far wrong if we "blame it on prohibition." The past year, also, has been a record-breaker for savings banks, even though there has been much unemployment and closing of big industrial plants. Again we say heartily, "Blame it on prohibition," for the bankers will tell you that many a man who never before had money to save because he spent it all over the barroom counter, has been seen every week or month since national prohibition went into effect, at the teller's window ready to make a deposit for the future home he is to build, for the education of his children, or for a competency for his old age.

Statistics Really Interesting

Today we have 100,000 Italians, 110,000 Hungarians, and 200,000 Russians in the city of New York alone. This is the statement recently made by the Record of Christian Work. The same magazine is authority for the statement that in Chicago there are 137,611 Poles, 122,788 Germans, 102,095 Russians, 59,215 Italians, 58,563 Swedes, 56,786 Irish, 50,392 Czecho-Slovakians, 30,491 Austrians, 26,420 English, 26,106 Hungarians, 26,054 Canadians, 20,481 Norwegians, besides representatives from dozens of other countries in numbers less than 20,000.

It would be most interesting if our local unions and Y. P. B.'s would make a survey of their towns or cities, or look up records showing how many people of these and other nationalities they have in their communities. Someone has said that although Jesus told us to go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature, we have gone so slowly that He has had to send all the world to us; this is the reason it is at our very doors. At any rate, since nearly, or quite, one-fifteenth of the globe's population is under the American flag, we cannot thrust our responsibilities upon foreign missionaries. These duties are our own, and they are tremendous.

An exchange tells us that an Italian boy, coming over to America on a steamer crowded with our tourists, learned a dozen words of the new language. When he stood on our shores, this little lad proudly repeated them. What would you wish these words to be? We cannot quote them, for eight out of the twelve were oaths—vile and obscene.

What are the foreign-born children in your community learning? What is their home environment, and with what companions are their free hours spent? Could not your union, together with the Y. P. B., insure a better tutelage than was given the little Italian stranger? Here is an opportunity to start the "big brother" and "big sister" movement in behalf of foreign children. The future of the town, and so of the state and of the nation, will depend upon them quite as much as upon native-born children; indeed, our statisticians tell us that they are to make up the preponderance of citizenship.

Surely this work is worth while.

NATIONAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION, ATLANTIC CITY, NEW JERSEY, NOVEMBER 18-23, 1922

Program of the National Council For Limitation of Armaments

The National Council for the Limitation of Armaments of which the W. C. T. U. is a participating member has announced a preliminary program for 1922 including:

First. A legislation committee, to be appointed the first of the year, which will study all measures before Congress from the point of view of their influence for or against war.

Second. The international organization of all peace groups which has already been begun with groups in England and Japan.

Third. An intensive educational campaign for which the country will be organized in small units. The publication of bulletins, meetings arranged through a national speakers' bureau, the compilation of bibliographies and the distribution of literature and posters will be a part of this educational campaign. Speakers and literature can be secured through the Council.

The Council is supported by individual contributions.

Mr. Bryan Pays Tribute to Woman's Christian Temperance Union

In a Christmas message received by our national W. C. T. U. president, Miss Anna A. Gordon, from the Hon. William Jennings Bryan, he says:

"We cannot reflect upon the days that have passed or look forward to the unfolding of the future years without recalling the splendid contribution made by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. It has helped to make the Christmas time happy for many who have not known joys before and throughout the future the number will increase. This ought to make this season of the year happy for you and your co-laborers."

"SEEKING NOTORIETY"

The most frequent public criticism upon the leaders of organized groups who are working for unpopular ends is that "they seek notoriety," and it must be admitted that those who look upon us from an unfriendly angle of vision can hardly fail to receive this impression. But the position of one who has been placed at its head by a great association is unique. A scientist goes through the long and heavy task of experimentation and rises to the level of his conclusions in the utmost privacy; seclusion is his necessary element. The poet dwells "far from the madding crowd"; the novelist works his spell in secret; but the statesman, the politician, the philanthropist and the reformer have publicity as their inevitable habitat. It is their work to win the majority, to gather a host, to be themselves a part of humanity's unresting tidal wave. They can no more be isolated than the coral worker who helps to build the reef, or the beam of light that seeks to bless the sod. Around their personalities must cluster the purposes, plans and aspirations of their coadjutors. Every crystal has a nucleus, and every movement has a leader; it is not his fault, it is often his misfortune, but there he is. Those who do not like him will say that he "seeks notoriety"; those who believe in him will say that he is wisely using the means furnished to his hand by modern civilization, whereby the public thought may be permeated by the principles and plans to which he is devoted. In sending out the news of the society along wires and by means of the press, he must permit his associates to include the news of his own movements, because the public will often read that, and be influenced by the reasons that lead him to be here and there, when its swift-moving eye would not be arrested by names that stand for less. In this fact is contained a certain stored-up electricity which lends momentum to the organism upon whose unity and enlargement, as the matrix of great principles, depends the incarnation of those principles in custom and in law.

Therefore, the philanthropist or reformer, whether it be in the small or the large circle, must look upon the imputation of personal motives in all that he does, and especially in the spread of the propaganda with which his name has become inseparably allied, as a part of the price, for unto this end was he born, and for this purpose came he into the world. He cannot shirk the difficulties, he cannot avoid the painful imputations, he must bear the brunt and pay the price of the work he is doing, and the publicity into whose vortex it has carried him. The one great question is—will he, in that vortex, sink or rise? But that is a question of his own specific gravity. If he is borne upward by an inextinguishable faith in God, and that love for his brother which "many waters cannot quench," he shall rise above "the swelling currents," and when his work is over, he shall, after the long and stormy journey, be "landed safe on Canaan's side."

And across the awak'ning continents,

A Noteworthy Definition of Liberty

It will be remembered by those conversant with the facts in the case, that for many years the various decisions of Federal and state supreme courts have been favorable to prohibition until in recent years there has not been a decision of any importance in favor of the promoters of the drink trade.

The plea of "personal liberty" now being stressed by the thirty odd varieties of societies opposed to prohibition is apparently destined to follow the same road toward extinction. The supreme court of the good old state of Maine, home of Neal Dow and Lillian M. N. Stevens, recently rendered a definition of freedom and personal liberty which we recommend to those engaged in boosting the propaganda for the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment. Personal liberty friend, cut it out and paste it in your hat!

"The great degree of liberty which we enjoy in this country, the degree of personal liberty which every man and woman enjoys, is limited by a like degree of liberty in every other person; and it is the duty of men and the duty of women in their conduct, in the exercise of the liberty which they enjoy, to consider that every other man and woman has the right to exercise the same degree of liberty: that when persons enter into society—and society is the state in which personal liberty exists—each gives up something of that liberty in order that the other may enjoy the same degree of liberty. It is a conception that perhaps some people find difficult to understand, but it is the conception of liberty which we enjoy."

According to the Burlington (N. J.) Enterprise, old records have been produced which show that probably the first action ever taken by a medical association in America against the use of alcohol was in Burlington, in 1831, when Dr. William S. Coxe of that city introduced before the county society a resolution stating that the use of distilled liquors increased liability to disease and rendered patients less amenable to medical treatment, and suggesting that the members abstain from prescribing alcohol "when less dangerous stimulants can be conveniently substituted and may be expected to prove equally efficacious." The resolution was hotly debated, but when, a half year later, it came up for a decisive vote, it was adopted, the physicians pledging themselves to "use all proper influence in the support and practice of temperate habits."

1918 Came Universal Democracy. Democracy starts no world wars, legalizes no recognized iniquities.

1919 Came National Constitutional Prohibition. America sober will lead the world to sobriety. A sober world will keep the peace.

1920 Came the Right of Women to Defend at the Ballot Box Their Own and Other Women's Children. Enfranchised womanhood throughout Christian civilization will make short work of drunkenness, war and whatever else hurts a child, a home, a church, a school or society—and these are "woman's climate, her native air, her vital breath."

1921 Came Our Signature to Treaties Making Peace with all our enemies and Our Leadership for Reduction of Armament. This is the first Christmas since 1916 when we could consistently join in the Herald Angels' song of "Peace... Goodwill." Let us see to it that it shall not be America's fault if the song is ever again silenced anywhere on the earth for which the Prince of Peace died and lives.

1922 Please God, Comes the Uncrowning of Mars and the Enthronement of International Brotherhood; the Return of Prosperity and the Sentence of Death against Alcoholism. All of these potentialities will have become blessed realities if Christian America will remain true to the "Heavenly Vision." Racially ecumenical, civically and religiously free, in every conflict triumphant for unity and liberty, the acknowleged embattled savior and peaceful leader of the world, nothing but selfishness and stupidity can deny us the Beatitude of the Peacemakers.

If in this hour of our supreme opportunity to become the greatest of the nations by being servant of all of them, our statesmen commit the blasphemy, as some of them have done for three years, of making a partisan foot-ball of the broken heart of humanity, fiddling at Washington as opposing partisans while the world burns, we shall have lost forever our well-earned right to the only worthy creed of a great nation.

RED LETTER DAYS

February 17—Frances E. Willard Memorial Fund Day.
March 1—Union Signal Subscription Day. (Birthday of Lillian M. N. Stevens.)

Keep Informed!

Mrs. Lem Gilreath, National Evangelist

My work has suffered this year because of my illness, and sickness in my family. However, I have had the privilege of attending some very fine meetings in the past few months.

There are wonderful echoes in my heart from the regional conference in Chattanooga, and I am still "quoting from" an institute held later in Knoxville. We had a fine evening service in the First Methodist church in that splendid little city, and our dear Mrs. Maude B. Perkins was at her best, and inspired us all with a sense of duty toward our young people. Hon. Asbury T. Wright was also a speaker of the evening, and we have been passing on a portion of his message. Judge Wright told us that the week before our institute, a man came to him and said: "Conditions are worse now than before we had prohibition. There is more drinking, and more bad behaviour." The judge commented, "I had a reply for him, having prepared myself to be at all times ready to meet such an assertion. I asked him if he had an idea of how much whisky was being sold at Knoxville. The man hesitated and finally declared that he felt sure that as much as five or six barrels a week were being disposed of." Then the judge asked him if he knew how much was sold when Knoxville had 132 open saloons, and the man said he was not aware of the fact that the town had had so many liquor shops. Judge Wright told him that he had positive information that when the saloons existed there were ten to fifteen car-loads of wine and whisky sold in the city every week, and at least fifteen car-loads of beer. Then the vendor of anti-prohibition mis-statements, when confronted with these facts and figures, "folded his tent like the Arab, and as silently stole away." We too can put them to flight, if we are informed as to facts.

In answer to the statement that prohibition is a failure, I told how we went with other Moody workers to the Cook County jail in Chicago for a Sunday morning service in the women's ward, and found thirteen women in all, three black and ten white, where there had been, in the days of the open saloon, as we were told by these Christian workers, one hundred to one-hundred-and-fifty. We also went to the detention station, and found there only three women, in a ward prepared for more than a hundred, which had been filled to the limit, only a few months before. These figures speak and in thunder tones; they cannot be controverted.

Prohibition is a success, a wonderful and glorious success. There are still some ugly fringes clinging to her train, but they are being cut away, one by one, and the day will soon come, please God, when because of prohibition's mighty influence there will be a strong, clean generation of men and women.

"I stand to my task and wait,
'Spite fatigue and delay and my sorrow,
For I feel in my face the breath of the dawn
Of a day that comes after tomorrow."

What Would You Say?

(Answers to Questions in THE UNION SIGNAL for January 12.)

1. The members of the American Medical Association have placed themselves on record in regard to alcohol, stating that as a beverage it is detrimental to the human economy, and that its use in therapeutics as a tonic, or a stimulant, or as a food, has no scientific basis.

2. In 1921 the use of alcohol for medicinal purposes was prohibited by law in twenty-two states.

3. In 1921 seventy-two per cent of the physicians in the United States did not take out permits for the use of alcoholic liquors as medicine.

4. The Supplemental Prohibition Bill (Wilis-Campbell Bill) "prohibits the prescribing of beer or malt liquors for medicinal purposes; not more than one-fourth gallon of vinous liquor, or vinous or spirituous liquor separately or in the aggregate containing more than one-half pint of alcohol, may be prescribed in ten days; physicians are limited to 100 prescriptions for liquor in 90 days, unless extraordinary reason is presented."

5. In regard to the proposition of the opponents of prohibition to place a tax on wine and beer for the purpose of raising revenue for the government, I would say in the words of Congressman Nelson in a recent speech before Congress, "The Constitution of the United States prohibits the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes. The kind of beer that is proposed to be legalized is intoxicating liquor, and is in violation of the Constitution of the United States. There would be no chance to raise a large amount of revenue from beer unless there was a real kick in it. The return of beer would unquestionably mean the return of the saloon."

Virginia News and Narrative

Faith T. Parrott

That people are saving and not wasting is shown in a treasurer's report of recent date, which indicated that out of the entire list of tax-payers ninety per cent had paid in full. Such a record (which can be duplicated in many sections of the state) was practically unheard of a few years ago. Yet, in the face of such a fact, there are those who declare prohibition is "no good." Temperance people recognize the propaganda of the enemy and work steadily on. When the state and nation combine to employ no officers without reasonably good records, and when jail sentences and not fines become more numerous, then only will there be the enforcement longed for and expected.

The supplying of our excellent state paper, The Virginia Call, to each member paying dollar dues is having good results in the way of intelligence and knowledge of plans set forth. The editor, Mrs. Effie B. Clement, is untiring in her efforts to add to the value of our state organ.

Pittsylvania has a wide-awake president, Mrs. Fitzgerald, who, with her home union at Chatham, initiated an observance of Armistice day of patriotic, inspiring effect.

During a fine efficiency congress, held in Richmond under national auspices, with every leading organization in Virginia represented, Mrs. Sara H. Hoge was the guest at the executive mansion of Governor and Mrs. Westmoreland Davis, and among those at the luncheon they gave the next day in honor of Marshal Foch and his attendants. Because of urgent temperance legislation coming before the approaching legislative session, Mr. and Mrs. Hoge have unselfishly abandoned their winter in Florida and will be in Richmond instead.

We record here the names of friends and comrades who have recently passed to the higher life:

Mrs. Huldah Gilbert Smith, of Poughkeepsie, New York. Although a member of several organizations, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union was the one in which she was most active, giving most generously of time, strength and money to the local organization.

Mrs. G. E. Alcott, president of the W. C. T. U.'s in Pharr, San Juan, and Alamo, Texas. Because of her broad culture, her sound judgment in practical affairs, combined with a winning personality, a prayerful spirit, and a generous stewardship of her means, she was a leader and a source of inspiration to all about her.

FORMER PRESIDENTS CALLED HOME

Mrs. Marion H. Dunham, Burbank, California. Mrs. Dunham was president of the Iowa W. C. T. U. from 1890 to 1908, and was also superintendent of the Scientific Temperance Instruction department for several years. Later she removed to Chicago and became president of the Cook County W. C. T. U. She was one of the gifted and indefatigable workers of her period and many of the present day workers remember her gratefully as one who inspired them to take up W. C. T. U. service.

Mrs. Ellen B. Turner, of St. Johnsbury, Vermont. Throughout a long and active life she was a worker in the church, contributing generously according to her means. She was also a member of the Women's Club, being interested in philanthropic movements and everything that pertained to civic betterment. But her special allegiance was given to the W. C. T. U. and at various times she served as local, county, and state president, state recording secretary and state auditor. By the terms of her will the state W. C. T. U. will receive $1,000. A consecrated woman of unusual executive ability and a most successful organizer, her loss is keenly felt in church and temperance circles and by a host of friends.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

EDUCATED ENTHUSIASM THE SOLUTION OF ALCOHOL PROBLEM

BY COURTENAY C. WEEKS,
PRESIDENT WORLD STUDENT FEDERATION AGAINST ALCOHOLISM

"The history of Heroes is the history of Youth. We live in an age when to be young and to be indifferent can no longer be synonymous. We must prepare for the coming hour. The claims of the future are represented by suffering millions, and the youth of a nation are the trustees of posterity." Thus does a great modern statesman re-echo, as it were, the words of the prophet of old who said, "Your young men shall see visions." In the name of the federation I write to ask you to share with us the vision which arose before us at Lausanne on August 27, 1921—the vision of a world from which the ravages of alcoholism have been swept away. We know that its realization is in your hands, you are indeed the trustees of posterity. Today you are students, pupils, disciples; tomorrow you will be the teachers and moulders of national life in thought and action. Whatever the future may hold for you, whether in law or medicine, in science or art, whether in commerce or the ministry of the church, everywhere you will be brought into contact with the tragedy of alcoholism, and the problems, domestic, social, scientific, and economic, which cluster around it.

It is therefore to you, the students of today and the leaders of tomorrow, we make our appeal. We desire to enlist your educated enthusiasm in the solution of one of the saddest and most universal evils in the world.

* * * * *

What can you do? Will you decide for yourself that for the sake of efficiency, in order that you may be at your best to meet the demands and temptation of life, you will abstain altogether from alcohol, and will seek to influence others to do the same?

Will you do all in your power, whether an abstainer or not, to promote study and discussion of the subject, seek to ascertain how alcoholic indulgence is the ally and handmaid of other causes which make for national degeneration, and endeavor to influence public opinion so as to provide such wise legislation as shall prevent as far as possible the evils of alcoholism?

You will have to battle against ignorance and indifference as well as against opposition; you will have to fight against traditions and customs, many of which are based on fallacies which modern science has exposed; you will often have to stand alone if you really seek to arrest the drift of alcoholism in your national life. You will need courage; it is a hard and difficult thing to fight against long established customs which are strongly entrenched in the life of a nation. Many will laugh at you, some will assail you, but all the world over comrades will be fighting with you in spirit and determination. The issue is assured, truth must prevail, the victory shall be ours, therefore, on behalf of the federation I close with the words of a great patriot:

"Have faith, ye who suffer in a noble cause, apostles of a truth which the world of today comprehends not. Tomorrow, perhaps, this world now incredulous or indifferent will bow down before you in holy enthusiasm. Tomorrow Victory will bless the banners of your crusade. Walk in faith and fear not! Believe and you will conquer! Believe! and at last the people will follow you."

Ohio Group Conferences

Fannie A. Drummond, National Y. P. B. Field Secretary

At the Ohio Y. P. B. state convention last June, it was decided to hold three regional conferences during the holiday vacation—the northeastern counties to meet in Cleveland, northwestern in Toledo, and the southern in Wilmington.

We looked forward to the experiment with no little anxiety. Would the young people be sufficiently interested in Y. P. B. work to give up a day of their Christmas vacation to attendance at the conferences?

A program committee in each group was appointed to prepare and print a program suited to its individual needs. The state Y. P. B. officers and superintendents attended the conference nearest to them, the state W. C. T. U. sent an officer to each one, while the general secretary attended all three conferences.

The result was very gratifying and the young people have asked that the plan be carried out again next year.

At the round-table conference the problems and needs of each group were discussed, also the best ways to carry on department work.

Mrs. Frances Fuller, state W. C. T. U. treasurer, in a most interesting address at the Cleveland conference, told of the channels through which our dues go and the great purposes for which the money is used.

Mrs. Sara K. Meredith, state W. C. T. U. recording secretary, spoke on peace and the duty devolving upon the young people to carry on this important work. No one could listen to her remarks and doubt that the time for world peace was here.

At the Toledo conference, our state W. C. T. U. president, Mrs Florence D. Richard, brought messages from the great meetings recently held in Washington on law enforcement, and forcefully reminded the young people of their responsibility to the nation today.

At Wilmington, Mrs. Viola D. Romans, state W. C. T. U. vice-president, not only won the hearts of her hearers, but their pocket-books as well! Many attending this conference drove long distances over country roads to be present. A neighboring county sent nine delegates, who drove thirty-four miles and stayed for the evening meeting. Another county sent five, who drove thirty-two miles, and a third county sent six, who came seventeen miles. Over one hundred were present for the afternoon session.

The general secretary of Ohio organized twenty new branches in the state during her recent tour. The slogan is a doubled membership and the dues of every member in on time.

The Cause in Many Lands

While musing upon the progress that is being made in temperance work in other lands, quite by accident we step upon our "magic carpet," and unhampered by speed laws, are transported to India. Going from place to place we review the situation and find that large numbers of Hindus, Mohammedans and Buddhists, being utterly opposed to the use of intoxicating liquors, can be depended upon to co-operate with the temperance forces in bringing about the overthrow of the liquor traffic. A prominent editor tells us that the Bengal Legislative Council has adopted a resolution "to restrict the consumption of intoxicating liquors and drugs by the application of the principle of local option to the municipal areas, and by imposing restrictions on consumption by enhancing the duty, increasing the retail price, reducing the number of shops, limiting the hours of sale, and reducing the issue of strengths."

Where to next? There are so many places from which to choose that we become desperate, open our Baedeker at random, close our eyes and jab madly at the page with a pencil. Eureka! we find that the lead has rested on England. Now we can interview Miss Agnes E. Slack, honorary secretary of the World's W. C. T. U. Our carpet is not out of commission, but we feel that in a very casual survey, such as ours must be, there are some things of interest that might escape us. So Miss Slack describes her visit to St. Gilles prison in Brussels, accompanied by Governor De Devne and Professor Ley, who is on the Prison Commission, and a brain specialist. Because of the vast amount of misery caused by drink that came under his notice in his prison experiences, Dr. Ley has become an ardent temperance advocate. Religious, political and social reasons make the temperance work advance very slowly in Belgium, but nevertheless the tide of sentiment is rising.

In Bulgaria there are signs of life all along the line, with groups of temperance workers in churches, public schools and communities. Some towns have closed their saloons.

With Scotland in mind we are next whisked to Edinburgh, and find that nine thousand persons, all over eighteen years of age, have signed the petition of the Citizens' Council in favor of the closing of all licensed premises at nine o'clock every evening, and on Saturdays from noon onwards.

Now a whirl to Sweden where we are greeted cordially by our white ribbon comrades, and find them very optimistic concerning the outlook for the referendum vote which is to be cast in 1922. Ten per cent of the newly elected Riksdag is reported to be favorably disposed toward prohibition. The temperance forces are making a brave fight and expect to carry the popular vote by a good majority.

In our hurried visit to Japan, where next we are transported, we are pleased to learn that a campaign for the acquisition by Japanese women of the ballot, in order to attain the more fundamental aims of the W. C. T. U., was decided upon at the national convention of the W. C. T. U., when it was held recently at Tokyo.

One last trip we must make before our "magic carpet" disappears, and that is to New Zealand. So presently we are dropped down in the very place we wished to see, Invercargill, the city which for fifteen years has furnished the chief argument for prohibition in Australia, since its emphatic decision in favor of no-license. From every point of view the experiment has been successful. Consequently, at every succeeding poll increasing majorities have been cast in its favor, and as one editor says, "There is no combination of forces sufficiently powerful to persuade Invercargill to take the step backward". Of course there were direful predictions by the liquor interests as to the result of no-license, and equally of course the prognosticated slump never occurred, but just as in the case of dry towns in the United States, the commercial prosperity of the town and the value of real estate have increased by leaps and bounds while savings banks returns furnish additional testimony of thrift and prevailing prosperity.

As our genie deposits us in our own offices once more, we find our desks heaped high with glowing accounts of the blessings that follow in the wake of prohibition elsewhere, but as Rudyard Kipling says—"that is another story." Some day we will give it to you.

SWEET POTATOES, real southern kind, kiln dried, delicious, direct to you. Half bu. $1.00; bushel $1.75 by Express collect. Satisfaction guaranteed. Reference, Bank of Wagram, N. C.—E. F. Murray, Laurinburg, N. C.

"Safeguarding the Nation"—Using the Motion Picture to Further Prohibition

The motion picture film, SAFEGUARDING THE NATION, may now be purchased or rented from the National W. C. T. U., Evanston, Ill. Since the editing copy of the film was shown at the national convention in San Francisco last August it has been perfected by tinting and toning.

It is a graphic presentation of the latest scientific discoveries showing the effect of alcohol on the human system and the loss of physical and mental power due to its use. This is the fundamental truth upon which the educational work of our organization is founded. The attempt of the liquor interests for the election of a "wet" congress and "wet" state legislatures in the fall of 1922 for the purpose of amending the Volstead Act challenges the dry forces to bring the issue before the people in the most effective, forcible and quickest way possible. Therefore, we have adopted the channel of the motion picture as a means of showing the true nature of alcohol.

We are also prepared at national headquarters to suggest other material, such as short comedies or travelogues, that we endorse to be used with SAFEGUARDING THE NATION to make a complete program that will be interesting and entertaining as well as instructive. We will offer suggestions for co-operation with your local motion picture exhibitors, school and church officials and will furnish advertising helps to those renting or purchasing this film through our organization. This motion picture may be the means of adding funds to your treasuries as well as a means of putting across the message to the public of the real issue before us.

W. C. T. U. History in the Making

Our Woman's Christian Temperance Union is a School, not founded in that thought, or for that purpose, but sure to fit us for the sacred duties of patriots.—Frances E. Willard.

Publish the Good Tidings!

Fortunate is the local union that has the co-operation of the newspapers of its town. A stirring editorial or a news article on the history and present activities of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union will give the membership campaign a marked impetus. The following editorial appeared in the Aurora, (Ill.) Beacon, a paper that gives generous space each week to W. C. T. U. and prohibition news sent in by the Publicity director. After a brief but graphic review of the history of the W. C. T. U., the editor says:

"To make its broadly appealing program more effective, the W. C. T. U. is engaged in a Jubilee Campaign to increase its membership to One Million. It will be worth while for every woman who is eligible for membership at least to look into the merits of this modernized crusading woman's enterprise, and to consider carefully whether an organization which has so much to its credit because of its nearly fifty years' activity, might not with great profit to everybody turn its splendid forces into a broader social and educational field. It would be a pity in these days of great social need to lose the benefit of half a million trained women's efforts to better the life of the community. And if the task is worth doing, then the W. C. T. U. should have no trouble in securing its million members—mobilized to carry out its well-rounded program."

Why not ask your local paper to pave the way for your membership campaign by an editorial of similar tenor?

"Spell-Down" on Law Enforcement Manual

"The things I don't know about the prohibitory law would fill volumes," said a W. C. T. U. woman in reply to a question as to what could be done with a certain law-violating citizen. "I thought W. C. T. U. members were specialists on prohibition," retorted the questioner. "I imagined they were walking encyclopedias on that particular question. I am distinctly disappointed."

The W. C. T. U. woman flushed, and then said with a determined accent in her voice, "There is one W. C. T. U. woman who will know hereafter. That little pocket law enforcement manual shall be my vade mecum. I'll know its contents. I'll study it while I'm washing the dishes, putting the baby to sleep, or doing my ironing, and I'll induce my fellow members to do likewise."

Apropos of this one individual's good resolution, why not during the next few weeks, have in your union an old-fashioned "spell-down" on the Law Enforcement Manual. The president, or someone she may select, may prepare the questions to be propounded, and the winner should receive as a trophy of her triumph a "Service Star" window card.

Have You Registered?

Have you registered for the Correspondence Course on Americanization? The outline for this course is given on page 6. Forty-five students are enrolled and have been sent material for the course, and twenty-five more have signified their intention of taking the study. The course will be of inestimable value in helping you to meet the needs of your foreign-speaking neighbors.

What Would You Say?

(Answers to These Questions Will Be Given in Next Week's Paper)

1. If you were asked how many countries in the world have some form of prohibition?

2. If you were asked in how many countries the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is organized?

3. If you were asked who are the officers of the World's W. C. T. U.?

4. If you were asked how the World's W. C. T. U. is supported?

5. If you were asked what the National W. C. T. U. of the United States is doing to help support the World's work?

Entertaining the Church Missionary Societies

Has your local union entertained the members of the church missionary societies this year? A personally conducted tour around the world, by five or six of your best speakers, will give your guests a bird's eye view of W. C. T. U. work in other lands. A big map, on which the route from point to point may be traced by a narrow white ribbon, will be a picturesque feature. Starting from New York, one could journey southward to South America, and tell briefly the story of our enterprises in Argentina and Uruguay, and of Miss Hardynia Norville's and Muriel Ayres' fine service. Crossing the Atlantic to South Africa we find ourselves among very active comrades, in a field to which Mrs. Deborah Knox Livingston is soon to give help for a few months. On to Australia and New Zealand, always in educational or legislative campaigns for prohibition, the last named country to have the aid of Mrs. Mary Harris Armor during the year; north to Japan, the home of the venerable Madam Yajima, honorary president of the W. C. T. U.; across to China, where we meet our "very own" Christine Tinling and Frances Willard Wang. In India and Ceylon we catch a glimpse of the fine work of Mary J. Campbell and Flora E. Strout. Taking the trans-Siberian railroad we cross to Europe, with its many centers of W. C. T. U. service.

Is the "Star in the Window" Shining Along Your Street?

You may not have the courage to deliver a lecture or preach a sermon on law observance, but you can ask your neighbors to display in their windows one of the beautiful "Service Star" cards, with the significant words, "Serve America. Support the Constitution."

Try This Tonic!

"If your local union is a bit spiritless and lacking in enthusiasm, try a school of methods as a tonic," suggests a worker of many years' experience. "Invite the neighboring local unions to join you in this institute. Arrange for a luncheon at twelve o'clock, each member bringing a contribution of sandwiches, salad, fruit or cake, and the entertaining union providing a hot drink. Following the luncheon, start the program without delay, with the spirited singing of 'Win a Million Members.' Have two good speakers lead, in short talks, a discussion on certain departments of work. Conduct a Question Box, thereby giving an opportunity for consideration of problems that any worker may desire discussed. Sometime during the afternoon have music by high school orchestra or chorus, or a group of young people. Close with the singing of 'Work for Enforcement.'"

The lot of the Mason county (Mich.) sheriff is a hard one. A lone prisoner completed his term in December, and crime is a negligible quantity in that region, according to the Pontiac (Mich.) Daily Press. Difference Between English and American Views on Prohibition

"Pussyfoot" Johnson never lacks a proper answer. In India he was asked publicly, "Why is Great Britain so far behind the United States on the temperance question?" The question contained a high explosive, considering Mr. Johnson as an American, with headquarters in London, speaking in India. He answered: "Great Britain considers the liquor business so bad that she closes up the liquor-selling shops sixteen hours out of the twenty-four; and America shuts them up the whole twenty-four. There is a difference of only eight hours."

—Western Christian Advocate.

Dry Regime Wins Friends For Prohibition

It is reported that Dr. Karl Fries, general international secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association, on returning to Stockholm after a four weeks' stay in New York, Chicago and other cities, expressed the hope that Sweden would speedily follow the example of America and adopt prohibition. Dr. Fries was impressed by the fact that during the course of his visit he saw no one under the influence of liquor, no smuggling of intoxicants into the numerous hotels and restaurants he patronized; and that the immorality so frequently observed on the streets of London and Paris was absent. He found that many employers who had previously opposed prohibition, now endorse it, because of the increased punctuality, regularity, efficiency and application of their employes under the dry regime.

Articles of Interest in Current Periodicals

"Miss China," by Emma Sarepta Yule in Scribner's for January.

"Chinese young women are putting new energy into the temperance work. One organizer said that this was necessary to offset the increase of breweries and other alcohol factories in China since the adoption of the prohibition amendment in the United States. 'We do not want alcohol to get the hold opium was allowed to because China was not organized against it,' said this youthful Frances Willard. 'Our work is directed against opium and gambling as well as alcohol.' "

The Diary of a South African

(Elsewhere in this issue will be found an advertisement of this entertaining autobiography, by M. M. Steytler. We are quoting from it the portion telling how a man who had been brought up to consider that liquor was a good gift of God, to be taken in moderation, was influenced to give up the drink department of his business.)

"One evening a man called at my store and asked for a shilling. I refused, and said, 'You are a drunken loafer, and I will not give you sixpence; but I will give you food.'

"He laughed in my face, and answered: 'Do you know who I am?'

"I failed to recognize him until he supplied his name, when I was shocked at the change in him. He continued: 'I came here in 1872, and you started me in a canteen; I became a drunkard, my wife and daughters are on the streets, and you see what I am.'

"'Look here,' I answered, 'don't put your misery down to me; you would have got the support I gave you from anyone else, for you brought excellent testimonials from the Colony when you arrived, and in any case you would have been just what you are all the same, but this I will admit: I made money out of your misery, and I promise I will give up the alcoholic liquor business.'

"In justice to myself, I must explain that in our store we sold rough goods, food, groceries, and drink, so that what my visitor designated a 'canteen' was, in reality, a small shop, or 'Universal Provider.'

"That night I went home and told my wife that I would not go on with the accursed trade, and that although I was only selling wholesale, yet it was wholesale slaughter, and, with God's help, I resolved to start afresh.

"Fortunately for me everything in the store was 'on consignment,' so that I was not personally liable for anything. When I was clerk in a wine merchant's office in Capetown I used to take pleasure in my work, and boasted to John of the number of casks of brandy I gauged and marked off in one day. My conscience never troubled me. In that frame of mind I started business in Kimberley. But when I came into close contact with the trade, I realized that I had to be friendly and chatty with barmen, who gradually deteriorated from fresh-looking men to bloated drunkards; then my troubles began. However, I could not give up my business without seriously affecting the men to whom I owed money. The shock I had experienced when I was told by the Bank that Maynard, Walker & Co. were no good, and that I was ruined, caused me endless misery. However, looking back, I thank God for that bitter disappointment; for had Maynard, Walker & Co. not liquidated, I should have continued with their support, and today I might be the possessor of one of the largest liquor stores in South Africa. I cannot be too thankful that I was pulled up in my career and given the opportunity to begin again, as a poor man, it is true, poorer even than when I began to trade, for I had to pay £1,000 for a store that originally cost me £150, yet I felt free to choose a business that would not injure my fellow-men in body and soul. Today I can honestly say that not one penny of what I have or may leave to my children was made from the sale of liquor.

"I wrote to all parties who had consigned liquors to me, and asked them to allow me to hand over their belongings to someone else—the rest I could dispose of myself. Amongst them were sixty casks of brandy belonging to P. Marais, wine merchant, Capetown. The cost was about 8s. 6d. per gallon at Kimberley; the man who took it over kept the stuff for a large profit. I wrote him, saying that as I knew he had been offered 9s. per gallon and would not sell, all responsibility regarding loss to Mr. Marais was off my shoulders. The brandy rose to 9s. 6d., yet he would not sell; finally it fell, and he was compelled to sell at a loss. He and Mr. Marais always said that it was through my action that they lost money. But in the face of the above facts their statement is absurd."

* * * *

"In this connection I must mention a firm in Kimberley who started the liquor business the moment they heard I had relinquished it. There were five partners, who were doing well in the general business, groceries, furnishings, etc. I begged and prayed Alfred, the senior partner, to have nothing to do with the liquor trade; he simply laughed at me. But, not many years after, Alfred had to be sent on a sea-trip to keep him away from drink, and whilst on board his 'grog' was stopped, by the Captain's orders. This was just what Alfred's friends wanted. He arrived in England and became so confirmed a drunkard that those interested in his welfare sent him back to the Cape, and again the 'grog' was stopped on the voyage. These sea-trips inspired vain hopes of his cure. One partner committed suicide, another is said to have died of dropsy, the result of his drinking habits, and the only brother now living is he who protested against the selling of alcohol, and was laughed at for a 'Psalm-singer' and 'sanctimonious humbug'!"

County Union Honor Roll

Della F. Withers, Circulation Manager

We are eagerly waiting for a report from the counties that are one hundred per cent perfect on the Trio-Team plan and thus entitled to be listed on the County Union Honor Roll. Perchance we are a bit impatient and eager as the announcement was published only week before last, but we are certain there are counties that can qualify. We repeat the terms of eligibility.

WHAT IS IT? Any county all the local unions of which are one hundred per cent perfect as regards THE UNION SIGNAL Trio-Team plan is to be listed on our County Union Honor Roll, to be published in our official paper.

HOW TO GET ON. To be entitled to a place on this Honor Roll, the county president must certify that the three leading officers of every local union in the county have the weekly UNION SIGNAL, either by personal subscriptions, or as a gift from the union paid out of its treasury, or by special fund.

WHEN TO GET ON. Now! Which county will be the first to send in its name to start the County Union Honor Roll?

Union Signal For New Members

"We have gained nine new members," said the president of one of the local unions of Cook County (Ill.), "and we have given to each of them a subscription to the Law Enforcement Edition of THE UNION SIGNAL. We expect them to like it so well that in another year they will be taking the regular edition. Of course our Trio-Team has the official paper!"

Union Signal Furnishes Copy for Local Press

"Use THE UNION SIGNAL and the bulletins the Publicity department sends out?" exclaimed a county president of Illinois in reply to a question. "Of course I do. That's what I depend upon for my weekly column in our local paper. It doesn't want it in type as if copied, but if I re-write the material, it will publish it, prohibition paragraphs and all. If my SIGNAL doesn't come Saturday, as it usually does, I feel at a loss Sunday, for our Bible class leader invariably says, at the close, 'Perhaps Mrs. —— has something to say along temperance lines.' And if I have received my SIGNAL you may be sure I have."

Good For the Y. P. B.

"I shall recommend the Trio-Team plan to the Y. P. B. of Iowa," says Edith E. Smith, of Ackworth, Iowa. "I have just suggested as a part of the supplies for a new Y. P. B. to be furnished by the W. C. T. U. of Fontanelle, Iowa, that they supply the Y. P. B. officers with three copies of THE UNION SIGNAL."

Bright Idea—Subscribe For An Extra!

"Certainly I take THE UNION SIGNAL," writes one of our subscribers. "I have for I don't know how many years—a score or more anyhow. My husband takes it, also, so I have one to give away or cut clippings from. I also happen to be president of a local union, in which all of the officers and some of the superintendents are subscribers."

"Thank You" From South America

"THE UNION SIGNAL is more and more useful to us in our work. Its message is far-reaching," writes Mrs. C. Van Domselaar, president of the white ribbon organization of Uruguay, South America. "Very often items of world temperance news are translated into Spanish and circulated throughout the country, by means of the daily press, our official organ, El Lazo Blanco, or perhaps in little leaflet circulars that are given out wherever it seems best. Scientific facts and statements by people of prominence are quoted in temperance lectures. We are realizing the importance of spreading facts concerning the benefits from prohibition to counteract the false statements of the enemy, and the up-to-date news THE UNION SIGNAL brings us along those lines is of great value."

Hotel Men Favor Prohibition

Prohibition may have kept hotels from reducing the rates on rooms, but it is nevertheless welcomed by hotel men. This was the statement made at the recent meeting of the Illinois Hotel Association by its president, George T. Thompson. Mr. Thompson claims that there is now less trouble with the guests than when many of them were drinkers, and that conservative patrons are not disturbed at all hours of the night by carousals. There also has been a distinct saving in furniture, and in short, life is easier for the hotel profession.

JUSTIFIES ITSELF

Prohibition has already justified itself, and sound common sense demands that it be continued in full force.—Wheeling, (W. Va.) Intel.

Headache Guaranteed

Capper's Weekly tells of a proud home brewer who took a sample of his beer to Dr. J. M. Doran, chief prohibition chemist in Washington, D. C. "It must be at least ten per cent," said he, "because it leaves you with an awful head in the morning."

Dr. Doran took the home brew into his laboratory, tested it and found that it was not properly made and contained no alcohol at all, but it was full of ptomaines, the poison found in spoiled food, which so often causes death.

The book gives a vivid description of the writer's boyhood, a picture of life in a good class Dutch circle, and the story of the early days in the diamond fields. IS OUR OPTIMISM CONCERNING THE PROHIBITION SITUATION WELL FOUNDED?

WHAT ARE THE GROUNDS OF OUR CONFIDENCE?

These are days when we must not only be optimistic concerning prohibition but be able to give a reason for the faith that is in us that ultimate success will crown the efforts of those who are working for the enforcement of the law. Magazines and newspapers are featuring questionnaires on "What Do You Think of Prohibition?" and optimists, pessimists and our antagonists are filling the columns of these periodicals with their opinions pro and con. What is noticeably lacking, however, in most of these so-called surveys, is definite, authentic evidence.

There are at least five outstanding reasons why we can be optimistic over the present situation, reasons that are not only convincing to our own intelligence but that ought to convert the sceptical individual who is being confused and misled by wet propagandists.

First: There Has Been a Decrease in Consumption of Alcoholic Liquors

Congressman Goodykoontz of West Virginia, in a speech in the House of Representatives, December 21, said there is not being consumed five per cent of the alcohol that was consumed prior to national prohibition. Deets Pickett of the Research department of the Board of Prohibition of the Methodist Church, says, "There has been an enormous decrease in the consumption of liquor, a decrease not less than 85 and possibly more than 90 per cent." Congressman Nelson of Minnesota, speaking before the House of Representatives, declared that "home brew and the manufacture of moonshine whisky while troublesome in certain communities has been almost a negligible factor when the amount of this illicit manufacture is considered." One of the best informed men on the subject of home brew, Congressman Nelson quotes as saying there is not a home brewing outfit in more than one out of each 1,000 families in the United States.

Decrease in consumption is shown also by the increased price of liquor, for even the vilest concoctions sell now at $12 to $20 a quart whereas in old license days, whisky could be bought for $1.00 a quart. In short, it is becoming increasingly inconvenient, expensive and dangerous to indulge in drinking, and the decrease in consumption is what one would expect. "This decrease ought to be apparent to anyone who wants to see it," remarks William Jennings Bryan. "They used to bring liquor in by the carloads, deliver it in drays at the principal street corners, and bottles were arranged on shelves to lure men to drink. No carload lots are now shipped, they do not deliver it by the dray loads at the street corner saloon, nor is it sold on the principal streets nor exhibited on the shelves. It is brought largely in valises and carried at night through the alleys."

Second: There Has Been a Marked Decrease In Drunkenness

Figures that bear eloquent testimony to the truth of this statement are to be found in the annual report of the Washingtonian Home, a retreat for alcoholics, located in Chicago, which is facing a changed situation for "lack of patronage," and has been obliged to close one of its branches. The Neal Institutes for the treatment of inebriates report a similar experience, the proprietor having embarked in other business. Some time ago Commissioner Haynes said statistics showed a decrease in arrests for drunkenness of about 60 per cent, but remarked that "A few selfish souls in pursuit of a dollar or drink make more noise than the whole United States Supreme Court when in session." Commissioner Haynes says that on recent visits to New York and Philadelphia the number of drunken men seen by him could be counted on the fingers of one hand, while before prohibition the sight of drunken men on the public streets was so common as to excite no surprise.

"In my study of the prohibition situation in the United States," says Gifford Gordon, a lecturer from Australia, "one of the things that struck me most forcibly was the difficulty I had in finding drunken men; I could find more drunken men in Melbourne, Australia, in ten minutes than in America in two months." Pages of testimony from different cities could be given to show the improved condition in this regard, but the statement in the New York Times of January 1, that the night before had been the driest and decentest New Year's eve in the history of New York, is typical of much of the evidence that could be given.

Third: There Has Been Increased Co-Operation on the Part of State and City Police, Judges and Juries

Commissioner Haynes at a recent public meeting read at length from letters from state Federal officials showing better co-operation of state and city police, greater inclination on the part of juries and jurists to mete out justice, and punish offenders. Even in as difficult a field as Chicago, the mayor and chief of police have publicly pledged themselves to enforce the law, and the Federal officials are receiving satisfactory support from state and municipal officers. Excerpts from reports of state directors read like this: "Juries becoming responsive to public sentiment." "Juries in sympathy with Volstead Act." "Dry law offenders are being given from three to six months on chain gang or in jail."—(this from South Carolina.) "No trouble in securing convictions." "Attitude of Federal and state juries leaning toward enforcement." "So far as Federal courts are concerned when cases are presented for trial, juries invariably bring in verdicts of guilty."

Fourth: There Is a Growing Sense of Responsibility on the Part of the Average Citizen

The good people are uniting in community law enforcement movements, and demanding that the law be enforced. They are holding enforcement mass meetings to arouse a lethargic public, and are carrying on a campaign of education to inform the people of the actual value of prohibition, and the loss entailed in the failure to adequately enforce it everywhere.

There are indeed reasons too numerous to mention why the advocates of the dry law may feel encouraged and hopeful. The one man in the United States who is in a position to know the best and the worst of the enforcement situation, Major Roy A. Haynes, Federal Prohibition Commissioner, at Washington, D. C., is the most optimistic. He said the other day in a public address, "I never was more confident of the success of national prohibition than I am this very minute." And then he gave the most fundamental and far-reaching ground for his optimism—that as God was with us at the inception of this righteous movement, he confidently believed that He would with us carry it to a triumphant end, and the United States would stand before the world as a nation that had fully demonstrated its power to overcome an age-old evil.

PROHIBITION WINS IN PUBLIC DEBATE AT CEYLON'S FIRST NATIONAL CONVENTION

Flora E. Strout

We have just emerged from the throes of our first national convention, which was an unqualified success in every way, and consequently our heads are very much in the air and we have rather a sniffy manner toward other and less fortunate organizations!

We were bold enough to begin proceedings with a public debate on prohibition vs. license and had two very prominent men as leading speakers. Prohibition won by a large majority, as it ought to have done, because the only arguments worth while were all on that side. The collection taken at that meeting, together with what we received from the tiffins, more than covered expenses. A wealthy member paid the cost of the garden party.

Why, yes, we had a garden party! It was altogether delightful, with a glee club to help out and delicious things to eat. Everyone became acquainted with everyone else, and the Organizing secretary, (myself) gave her report, which was really a review of the work for the information of such of our guests as were not in touch with our society.

As for attendance, it was splendid! Delegates came from all of our affiliated societies and there were fraternal delegates from many others. Best of all, they stayed throughout the whole proceedings, even through the hot time of the day, and it was hot. They even remained during the election of officers and the reading of the resolutions, not seeming to feel the need of shopping expeditions and excursions.

As to the business program, one whole day was given over to a school of methods when our superintendents, some of whom had never before spoken in public, presented their work and conducted the discussions. There was not a "dry moment," most improper, I know, for a

W. C. T. U. convention, in one sense. The second day was given over to reports, addresses and other features. Our president gave a very fine address, a thing she had never done before; I mean, up to that time, she had never in her life given any sort of a speech. She is the wife of a prominent official and very charming. We all love her.

The editors of the five newspapers had the shock of their lives when they were asked to publish proceedings in full, but they found it all such good "copy" that they gave space to everything even unto the last item! Everybody thanked everybody else, and after the reading of the plan of work for the new year, the president declared the first National W. C. T. U. convention of Ceylon adjourned. We have been indulging in secret chuckles to think that we have beaten the World's W. C. T. U. on a department of Substitutes for Drink Shops. Our first "Workmen's Resort," as it is called, is doing a great work.

Following are the national officers for the new year: President, Mrs. C. H. Collins; vice-presidents, Mrs. H. M. Pieries, Mrs. Edward Mather, Dr. (Mrs.) Nellama Aiyar; corresponding secretary, Mrs. L. A. Joseph; recording secretary, Miss Hornby; treasurer, Mrs. R. E. Carter; executive secretary, Miss Grace Nathanielsz. Seven departments are in full swing and we are rejoicing over renewed and more extensive activity. We have in view a young people's rally, a children's mass meeting, an adult medal contest; besides which we are inaugurating play centers and are planning to have a booth at the All-Ceylon Industrial Exhibit which is to be held in March.

In Jaffna, where I started a Tamil union with 100 members, there are now 400, and in Galle, the union has nearly doubled its membership, so we have reason for holding our heads a little high and for assuming the air of pitying condescension which we carry!

Now for another bit of good news: The Straits Settlements organization has at last found a worker to help out, an English woman who has had training in social work and who will occupy the same position that Miss Mack, in Burma, and Miss Nathanielsz, in Ceylon, fill so capably. I wish she could have come before I left Malaya as she needs to know about our methods and conditions there, but reports show that the work is still flourishing and Mrs. Ferguson-Davie, the wife of the Anglican bishop is acting as national president. She is very fine and our committees there are so excellent that Mrs. Stitt, the new worker, will have strong backing and, doubtless, soon find her place. I shall keep in constant touch with her.

I feel sure you will agree with me that there is much for which to thank God.

WHAT ARE WOMEN IN INDUSTRY LAWS?

By Mary Van Kleeck, First Director of Woman's Bureau U. S. Department of Labor, Now Director of Industrial Studies, Russell Sage Foundation

The mechanical method is the basis of our industrial order today and all production is affected by the type of organization which the machine symbolizes. The fundamental fact is that women who are working in mechanical industries are not in a position, by their own word, to determine what their opportunity or what their hours or what their wages shall be.

So action by the community has developed in recognition of the fact that it is the conditions and not the individual that need to be controlled.

Let us distinguish between the different kinds of labor laws. A labor law is not a single, uniform concept. Let us consider as illustrations some of the labor laws of this country. A law in which I am sure you were all interested was passed in 1920, in Washington, to put on a statutory basis the Woman's Bureau in the Department of Labor, and to provide through it for the collection of information, and the establishment of standards and policies affecting women in industry, to enlarge their opportunities, and to improve their working conditions by means chiefly of investigation and publication.

This bureau is controlled by women for essentially the same reason that you are the Woman's Christian Temperance Union instead of a union of men and women. You recognize the fact that by getting together at this particular stage of our economic and political life we are going to be in a position to deal with questions of importance to us, and to make the influence of women a real contribution to the public service.

Women First—Then All Workers

Then, consider another kind of labor law: The very simplest form is one which prescribes certain sanitary conditions in a factory. In the beginning, I think in all our eastern states, these have specified protection of women and children, but the tendency has been to make this merely the first step. Now I do not believe that there is a state in the country which does not apply this form of "protective legislation" to the entire industry, whether men or women are employed. So, beginning with special legislation for women, it has been extended to the advancement of all workers.

Then, there is another kind of labor law, which is solely a health measure, prohibiting the employment of women in certain occupations involving hazards to health. I believe we would all agree that we want these occupations made fit for women by removing the hazards rather than prohibiting the employment of women in them, unless it be an occupation like certain processes in the manufacture of lead products, in which it is agreed by most scientists the danger for a woman is greater than for a man. A lead-poisoned mother may be unable to bear a child, or, if she does, the child is likely to die in the first year of its life. That is a physiological fact, and I am sure that we would agree, again, that if it is a physiological fact that women are affected more disastrously than men by the hazards of an occupation, we would not regard that occupation as an "opportunity" for women. We would approve, in those circumstances, of prohibition of the employment of women. But when the process can very easily be made safe, then we would say, let us make the occupation safe, and let us open that occupation to women. That is another kind of protective legislation.

Why Do We Have These Laws?

1. See Union Signal, February 23, 1922, for Scientific Temperance Reasons.

2. Write National Director, 1511 Maple Ave., Evanston, Illinois, for free copy of "Economic Reasons," by Miss Van Kleeck.

Should Women's Hours Be Shorter?

Still another kind is the legislation that restricts the hours of women, either limiting the number by day or prohibiting night work. This is legislation with a long history, based partly on the physiological laws of fatigue, and partly on the social considerations involved in the fact that women wage earners have the double duty of wage-earning and home-keeping, and that in practice, those home duties are added to the duties of work. Thus, on that general ground of social need, social exigencies, you might call it, which may not last forever, and in accordance with physiological laws which are likely to last longer, we have been developing our labor laws for women.

I am coming back to the question as to why that type of labor law should not always apply both to men and women, but I want to leave it here just for a moment to make this statement: This is different from the law that regulates sanitary conditions. The moment you touch the question of hours of work, you touch the economic balance of power as between the employer and the employe, and that is the reason why you usually have such a row about it. Every time you try to touch it through legislation, somebody is going to profit by it or the reverse. Hence, it is not a clear-cut issue. It is recognized, in particular, that in shortening hours of work the wage question is intimately involved.

Where the Fight Starts

Workers consider that they have gained a new status when their hours have been shortened, and so you are touching a condition that is not merely physiological, and it is not only social, but is a measure of economic position and economic power. After they have won a new status through shorter hours, the workers are likely to seek further gains, —generally higher wages and better conditions and more power to control their own occupations. Every time you throw this question of hours of work into the arena, you have a fight over it between employing interests and the worker. That is the reason why we cannot dismiss it lightly as a simple expression of our economic theory about women, but must recognize all the varied aspects of it. I shall come back to that question because I realize that the discussion of it is left unfinished.

But now I want to mention another kind of legislation, and that is the establishment of minimum wage commissions. Minimum wage commissions do not mean the setting of a minimum wage by law in the usual sense. What a minimum wage commission does, as it is being advocated by several organizations of women and as it is actually being tried out in some states and in the District of Columbia, is to give women workers a voice in setting their own minimum wages.

Sample Democracy

A minimum wage law establishes a commission on which employers, women workers and the public should be represented. I refer to the law generally recognized as the standard. Some laws have been put through with such amendments that they do not measure up to that standard. But in the best legislation the principle involved is that, in the interests of the community, the cost of living should be the minimum basis of wages, and that since in many communities, due to the economic weakness of women's position, women are the lowest paid workers, they should, therefore, be the group to be protected by law. Not because they are women, but because they are low-paid workers this minimum wage legislation is found necessary. Were they paid the same wages as men, we would not need a minimum wage law for women alone.

I think it is quite safe to say that in practically every study that has been made, the wages of women in an industry have been about half the wages of men in that industry. It is because women happen unfortunately to be the low-paid group that the community asserts itself to improve the status of that low-paid group, not to make an arbitrary law passed by the legislature, but to say, "We must have conference. We must have the minimum wage established on the basis, first of all, of facts, and, secondly, in accordance with the expressed judgment of the women who are involved, their employers, and the public."

And so you see, minimum wage legislation is entirely different from a law limiting hours of work, because the establishment of a minimum wage commission really gives to women a vote on the minimum wage to be paid to any woman or girl in their industry.

Labor legislation, then, takes many forms. Equally complex is the economic opportunity which women seek. Most complicated of all is the relation of labor legislation to economic opportunity.

We must control conditions and we must enlarge opportunities but the one cannot go on without the other because an opportunity which is only a chance to work under conditions that no woman ought to endure is not a desirable opportunity.

What Working Men Say

Now just a word about the reason why the men in the trade unions generally do not wish men to be included in laws limiting hours of work.

The American Federation of Labor had a very vigorous debate on that question several years ago. They came out with a vote which was very close, but it was a vote against endorsing the shortening of hours of work through legislation. That was because our American labor movement is committed to what is called economic action as opposed to political action; that is to say, they believe that they will be stronger if they gain their ends through trade unionism rather than through legislation. But bear in mind that the American Federation of Labor

THE EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

Deborah Knox Livingston, National Director of Christian Citizenship

There never was an amendment to the Constitution of the United States that was so thoroughly considered from so many angles by the people as the Eighteenth Amendment. For more than half a century the political, social, educational and economic aspects of prohibition had been discussed by the press, the pulpit and platform, as well as by the people themselves. Thirty-three states, either by the act of their state legislatures or by the people at the polls, had voted out the legalized liquor trade and were prohibition states. A large percentage of Congressmen came from these states and were committed to secure National Prohibition. For many years, from time to time, a prohibition amendment had been introduced into Congress but it was not until December, 1917, that the amendment finally passed Congress and was submitted to the several state legislatures for ratification. To do this is required a two-thirds vote in both Senate and House of Representatives. The Constitution further requires that three-fourths of the state legislatures must ratify an amendment before it can become the law of the land. On January 16, 1919, Nebraska, the thirty-sixth state (completing the required three-fourths) ratified the Federal Prohibition Amendment. Since then, nine other states have ratified, making a total of forty-five out of the forty-eight states, Rhode Island, Connecticut and New Jersey being the only states which have failed to do so. National Constitutional Prohibition went into effect January 16, 1920.

Text of the Amendment

The Eighteenth Amendment reads as follows:

"Sec. 1. After one year from the ratification of this article, the manufacture, sale or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, for beverage purposes, is hereby prohibited.

"Sec. 2. The Congress and the several states shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

Provisions of Section I

Section one of the Eighteenth Amendment provides five distinct prohibitions regarding intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes.

1. It prohibits the Manufacture; this affects all breweries and distilleries and puts them out of existence.
2. It prohibits the Sale; this affects saloons, hotels and all places where liquor is sold, either by wholesale or retail trade.
3. It prohibits Transportation; this means that no railway, steamship, airplane, automobile or any other vehicle in the United States or operating under the American flag can transport liquor.
4. It prohibits Importation; this means that no citizen or group of citizens, either for personal use or trade, can bring into this country alcoholic liquors for beverage purposes.
5. It prohibits Exportation; this is its most far reaching provision. It means that the people of the United States, having found that beverage alcohol contributes more degradation to the human race than any other thing, refuse to manufacture and sell to other countries that which they refuse to manufacture and sell to their own people.

QUESTIONS

1. How many prohibition states were there before we had National Prohibition?
2. How many states ratified the Prohibition Amendment?
3. When did the Eighteenth Amendment go into effect?
4. How many sections are there in the amendment?
5. What are the provisions of Section I?
6. What power is provided for in Section II?
7. What obligation has the state government in the matter of enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment?
8. How can the purpose of the Federal law be attained?
9. What reason did Representative Volstead give for the insertion of Section II in the Amendment?
10. What has Senator Nelson said regarding the concurrent legislative power conferred on the states?

Provisions of Section II

In this section, concurrent power is conferred upon the several states and the Congress to enforce by appropriate legislation national prohibition. Concurrent power means that both state and nation are given equal power to carry out the purpose of the Eighteenth Amendment. The Supreme Court of Massachusetts has rendered the following opinion as to the meaning of the phrase "concurrent power":—"The amendment does not require that the exercise of the power by Congress and by the states shall be coterminous, coextensive and coincident. The power is concurrent; that is, it may be given different manifestations directed to the accomplishment of the same general purpose, provided they are not in immediate and hostile collision one with the other. In instances of such collision, the state legislation must yield."

This is the first time that there has been written into the Constitution of the United States specific concurrent power to enforce a constitutional provision.

State Enforcement Codes

The state governments must assume the same obligation to enforce the Eighteenth Amendment within the state that the Federal Government assumes within the nation. We need, therefore, in every state, a prohibition enforcement code as strong and, if possible, even stronger than that enacted by the Federal Government. The purpose of the Federal law can only be attained in proportion as the several states concur with it.

Representative A. J. Volstead, author of the Volstead Act, has said, "To guard the so-called 'dry' states against the possible action of a 'wet' Congress, Section 2 of the amendment was inserted. This is the section that gives the states power concurrent with the Federal Government in enforcing prohibition of the liquor traffic."

Senator Nelson has said, "The concurrent legislative power conferred on the states is a power to enforce and not to destroy or nullify the amendment, or any part of it. The states may pass laws to aid in enforcing the amendment but they are utterly without power to in any wise nullify or destroy it."

ON THE WINGS OF LOVE

Eva Roberts Wood, Author of "In Rayagadda," "The Flag House," Etc.

The last guest had gone, the last merry good-night and best wishes had been said, and at last the wide-paneled, great-hinged door closed on the gay, laughing groups who had gathered to pay tribute to Galen Derby's sixteenth birthday.

It had been the best party of Galen's life. He had enjoyed every minute, it had been wonderful; but deep down in the recesses of his being, he had been anxious for it to be over. The sparkle in his deep blue eyes and the glow on his finely moulded face were not entirely from the excitement of the occasion; nor was the ceaseless moving of his long fingers and graceful limbs altogether instigated by the rhythm of the music. No!

As Galen slipped around the old, carefully carved newel post, and swiftly climbed the winding staircase to his room, a curious thrill of emotion swept over him. As he turned the knob of his own door, his fingers quivered as they touched the cold metal. As he crossed the threshold, and walked toward an old mahogany desk, an heirloom, the color surged to his cheeks. Turning the key to a small compartment he tremblingly lifted the lid to a tiny lacquered box, ran hasty fingers through various trinkets—bits of jewelry and small cards—then pulled out a big, square envelope, yellowed and crumpled with years, sealed with violet wax, and bearing this inscription:

"For my own dear Son:

"To be opened on the night of his sixteenth birthday.

"From his always loving
"Mother."

Galen touched the envelope softly, reverently. Holding it in his hand, he perused again the already familiar words and then in the quiet of the night, in the hush of his own chamber, broke the seal and read:

"My dear, my very dear:

"Do you remember the evening, the bright, twinkling evening with all the lovely, flickering lights when you, a tiny, cuddling boy, were up late waiting for Dad, who had gone over the hills, the big, round, frosty hills encircling our bit of a home, to bring to mother a new doctor?

"As you sat nestling against me, twisting your tumbled curls, and peeping sleepily up at the gorgeousness of a wide-skyed, thickly starred night, you asked: 'How far is it up to God, mother?'

"I tried to answer you then, my son; but you were such a mite of a laddie, and the question such a big one that mother was poorly equipped to answer. Well, anyhow, you fell asleep, dear, close to my tired, weakening heart, your wee, chubby fingers clutching mine. Breathing softly, you slumbered sweetly while angels scattered love-incense on the altar of your mother's heart, until the fire of gladness rose to meet the starry night.

"It was then I wrote this message to you, with the answer to your childish query, which something tells me, dear, you'll make again. When you are older, and are facing life in a new, uncertain way you'll struggle a bit, with the tender, erring wisdom of youth, to solve the mighty problems, which even sages have failed to fathom.

Union Signal Steam

There's a rumor floating around W. C. T. U. circles that the Trio Team of every local union is expected as a matter of course to have the weekly UNION SIGNAL. It is difficult to even imagine a Trio-Team that is not equipped with THE UNION SIGNAL carrying a membership campaign through to success. But don't imagine that it is only the Trio Team that is supposed to take THE UNION SIGNAL; the other officers, the superintendents, every member, indeed, ought to have it if she is to be really efficient. Lillian M. N. Stevens, whose birthday we celebrate March first, said: "THE UNION SIGNAL is the true exponent of W. C. T. U. plans, purposes and principles. Every white ribboner should feel in honor bound to give her loyal support to this paper. No white ribboner is adequately equipped who is not a subscriber."

It is hoped that every local union in the country will consider it a privilege to observe March first by holding a meeting, or arranging for a luncheon for the promotion of interest in and subscriptions to the official paper.

NATIONAL PRESIDENT TO VISIT BAHAMAS, CUBA AND MEXICO

In response to oft-repeated invitations, Miss Anna Adams Gordon, president of the National and the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union, is soon to visit the Bahama Islands, Cuba and Mexico. She leaves Evanston early in February, going via Florida, to Nassau; thence to Havana, Cuba, the Isle of Pines, Matanzas and Santiago. After a short stay at these points she will cross the Gulf to Mexico, and will spend most of the time while in the sister republic to the south in Mexico City, with short visits to Vera Cruz, Guadalajara and Guanajuato. Mrs. Dwight Furness, national president of the Mexico W. C. T. U., will meet her in Mexico, and it is hoped the work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union will be greatly extended and strengthened.

In this issue five different programs are suggested. On page 4 is a general program, that may be adapted to any group. On page 9 is a more specific and detailed program, all the material for which will be found in this number. A third suggestion is the demonstration or playlet on "Why Take THE UNION SIGNAL," to be participated in by eleven people, and the speaker. It is easily arranged; has been given in dozens of cities, and always with excellent results, and because of its success is printed in THE UNION SIGNAL, that it may be used more widely. No. 4, is "A Surprise Party" described on page 12 and No. 5, a UNION SIGNAL luncheon or supper.

Make this year's observance of UNION SIGNAL Day a record-breaker. Demonstrate that SIGNAL Steam can make not only the Trio Team but your whole membership more active, enthusiastic and efficient.

Let The Star in the Window Shine Forth Its Message

"I'd like to see that Star shining in every window in our town," remarked a minister as he held before him one of the new law observance cards of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. "I believe its influence would be far-reaching."

The "Star in the Window" idea has met with general approval. Letters commending it are being received at national headquarters in every mail; newspapers in cities, big and little, are giving it much publicity, some with illustrations. The Fox Film Corporation of New York wired its Chicago office to secure for its Pathe news feature a picture of workers putting the star in the windows of Evanston homes. What is even more significant, a paper unfriendly to our cause has scoffed at the idea—a bit of publicity that has been very helpful in arousing interest among the patriotic, law-loving people.

Orders for the card are coming in from every section of the country by the hundreds and thousands, and in smaller numbers. In order to make the Star campaign really effective, it must be done in a large way, and whole towns must blaze forth with the silent sermon, "Serve America. Support the Constitution." Do not content yourself with an order of a Star poster for "me and my son John," but send for at least a thousand—better make it five or ten thousand. Present one to each of the editors of your local papers and ask them to write editorials on the plan. Make a gift of a Star to each of your pastors, and suggest that they speak of it from the pulpit. Arrange to have some of the members of your Young People's Branch sell the cards in the bank or some community center. Advertise in the paper that the cards can be procured at the corner drug store.

From the windows of your homes and your shops let the Star shine forth its glowing message.

"SERVE AMERICA. SUPPORT THE CONSTITUTION."

What To Read

In these days, when books and papers abound, there is always a question of choice as to what to read. Young people, in particular, are apt to choose only what appeals to them. Many of your daily papers, with their wide circulation, have standards not of the highest, and some of the most popular magazines inculcate low social and moral ideals, influencing their readers on the wrong side of everything good. What is on your library table? Is it only the best material for young and old? Will the young people in your home look back in later years and thank God that their taste for literature has been carefully and skillfully directed? One man who is now prominent in the nation as a right thinker and moulder of public opinion is quick to say that as a boy he loved reading and devoured all sorts of books—anything that came to hand. But fortunately for him, while his parents had a large number of books, they were only of the best, whether fiction or any other kind of literature. The magazines were few in number, but likewise well chosen. Omniverous reader as he was, if he had not been able easily to have access to the best, and the worst had not been inconvenient to get hold of, he would today amount to little. This thing, more than anything else, he believes, directed his future life, and not only saved him, but all those who have been influenced by him, from the vitiating effects of the wrong kind of books and magazines.

Union Signal Quiz

1. How is THE UNON SIGNAL of assistance in the membership campaign?

Ans. THE UNION SIGNAL publishes the plans of the National W. C. T. U. for the membership drive; prints articles that increase the enthusiasm of members and awaken the interest of those we wish to attract; gives suggestions that have been "tried and proved" by unions succeeding in the work, and is most heartily endorsed by those who have used it most.

2. Will a woman be a better citizen if she takes and reads THE UNON SIGNAL faithfully?

Ans. Not only will the conscientious perusal of THE UNION SIGNAL pages widen the mental horizon of any woman in a general way, but in a very special way will she learn of her political duties by the "Studies in Government" and the Washington Letter. Now that Congressional elections are approaching the woman who knows from experience will say "you must have THE UNION SIGNAL."

3. How can THE UNION SIGNAL help in law enforcement?

Ans. Each month an issue is devoted to the question of law enforcement. Definite information is given on the benefits of prohibition, so that its readers may be enabled to convert the sceptical and teach the ignorant. This is absolutely essential at a time when the daily press is putting out so many misleading statements and specious arguments. Suggestions are given of practical ways of cooperation with law enforcement officials. Ask the woman who takes THE UNION SIGNAL if it is not a help in suggesting ways of putting force into enforcement.

4. Should the young people read THE UNION SIGNAL? Why?

Ans. There is a page each week in THE UNION SIGNAL devoted to the interests of the young people; there is clean and wholesome fiction; there are articles that are every bit as interesting as fiction though they deal with facts about the various phases of the work the organization is doing. For the sake of what the young people may get, they should read THE UNION SIGNAL. For the sake of what they may—and wish to—give, they should read THE UNION SIGNAL.

5. Why should we think that reading THE UNION SIGNAL will help in bringing world prohibition?

Ans. It is an axiomatic truth that we will not care to help that of which we know nothing. The thrilling stories from the pens of our workers in China, Japan, Malaysia, South America, and other countries will stir the hearts of the readers to pray, to give, and who knows? perchance to go, that world prohibition may be a dream come true. Has it not increased the heart's desire of the readers in your union?

6. Are there other ways in which THE UNION SIGNAL is a "first aid"?

Ans. If time allowed we might speak at length on the necessity of THE UNION SIGNAL for the worker in Americanization, Child Welfare, Women in Industry, and all the other departments. Do you want "to know" what has been done, what may be done by your union, and what you can do to make the world safer for your child or that of your neighbor? Do you care about the foreigners in your community and wish from the depths of your heart that you might make their lot brighter, but have not the least notion of how to go about it? Do you feel the necessity of gaining the allegiance of the Woman in Industry that as she goes out into the world she may use her influence for the right? If you are alive to the great need for consecrated womanhood and girlhood, let THE UNION SIGNAL come to your home with its inspiration and practical helpfulness. Ask the old subscribers about it.

Overcoming Mrs. Smith's Objections

"Only one more subscription needed to complete my club of ten," soliloquized Mrs. Brown, as she brushed the crumbs from the breakfast table. "There's Barbara Smith. She ought to take THE UNION SIGNAL. I'm going to ask her this very afternoon."

A few hours later, Mrs. Brown, attired in her best, sallied forth to call upon her neighbor, Mrs. Roger Smith.

Having disposed of the weather, inquired solicitously as to the health of the members of her friend's family, and given an opinion as to the new minister of the Congregational church, Mrs. Brown tactfully broached the subject she had come to present.

"When I've found something which is a special source of enjoyment, I always want to pass it on to my friends," she began pleasantly. "I've been taking the paper, THE UNION SIGNAL, for more than five years and I find it quite indispensable in my W. C. T. U. and civic affairs, as well as in church and Sunday school work. I'm getting up a club of ten, and lack just one name. I felt sure you would be delighted to give me your subscription."

Mrs. Smith smilingly shook her head. "I'd like to do anything you ask me, Mrs. Brown, but really just now I can't afford it, you know. There are so many expenses."

Mrs. Brown's tone was sympathetic. "Yes, I realize just how it is, Mrs. Smith. It is deplorable how fast the children's clothes and shoes wear out, and the price of foodstuffs keeps up outrageously. Of course if you cannot afford the paper, I wouldn't think of urging the matter, but it costs only three cents a week, or 12½ cents a month to subscribe—I always put it that way to myself as then it doesn't seem as much as $1.50 a year. I argued the question with myself at first, and then I found by a little financial adjustment I could do it quite easily."

Mrs. Smith listened thoughtfully, as Mrs. Brown continued:

"Of course to save that three cents a week, or that 12½ cents a month might involve a little hardship, like eliminating a movie once every four weeks, or an ice-cream sundae possibly every thirty days. Most women could more than cover the expense by reducing their expenditure for candy, but then, of course, candy is fuel, and we need more or less."

Mrs. Smith laughed, although her cheeks flushed. "Oh, Mrs. Brown, you are incorrigible. I withdraw my 'can't afford it' excuse. But there really are other reasons. Honestly, Mrs. Brown, I

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awak'ning continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

The Dead Sea or a Garden?

I looked upon a sea
And lo! 'twas dead,
Although by Hermon's snows
And Jordan fed.

How came a fate so dire?
The tale's soon told.
All that it got it kept
And fast did hold.

All tributary streams
Found here their grave,
Because the sea received,
But never gave.

O sea that's dead! teach me
To know and feel
That selfish grasp and greed
My doom will seal.

And help me, Lord, my best,
Myself to give,
That I may others bless
And like Thee live.

What Are Women In Industry Laws?

is actually on record in favor of many kinds of laws, such as one day of rest in seven, and that big constituent bodies in the American Federation of Labor, like the United Mine Workers, have worked consistently for legislation limiting their hours of work. Nevertheless, as a general theory the American Labor movement has gone on record against legislation limiting the hours of labor, and we must choose, as women, whether we believe that we should wait until they change their fundamental philosophy before we advocate a law for women or whether we will proceed independently.

The Working Women Say—

The working women themselves have spoken on this question. Every national organization of women, representing industrial workers, that has taken any action on it, so far as I know, has gone on record in favor of labor legislation for women.

There is a saying of Plato that the essence of equality is to treat unequal things unequally. In the July 1921 issue of The Atlantic Monthly is an interesting article which does not discuss women in general or women in industry. It is called "New Roads to Equality," and it analyzes the way in which we are abandoning some of our dislike in this country of what we used to call "class" or "special" legislation, because we have begun to discover that industrial development bears unevenly on different groups in the population,—that there are some groups who are rendered powerless by our particular kind of industrial development. So we throw legislation into the scales, as it were, to correct inequality. If you want to discuss your problem along theoretical lines, this is a question to ask: Are women in industry now equal to men in industry? Have they the same economic power, or have they less? If they have less, what can we throw into the scales that will make the desired equality come true?

Foot note: Thanks are due to the National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, Inc., for whom this material was prepared, to Miss Van Kleeck, and to the national board of the Y. W. C. A. for sharing publication privileges.

To Increase Both Membership and Subscription List

One union divided its membership into four parts, with a captain for each division. Each new member gained counted 100 points; attendance added ten points to the score; paid-up dues meant 15 points more; and each subscription to the regular edition of THE UNION SIGNAL added 100 points, each subscription to the monthly edition, 25 points.

At the close of the drive, which in this case lasted three months, the points were counted, and the team with the largest score was entertained by the other three. As each guest was accompanied by an outsider, the entertainment itself brought both new members and more subscriptions.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

"My Glass Along With the Others"

The following incident in the life of the late Sir Arthur Pearson of London, the founder of St. Dunstan's College for blind soldiers, is told by William E. ("Pussyfoot") Johnson in a recent American Issue.

"Two years ago, the day after I escaped from the London hospital where I had been confined because of a puncture in my right eye, Sir Arthur gave me a dinner at the officers' club of St. Dunstan's. In front of every plate save mine, there was a filled wine glass, and in some cases, two. Every one at the table was completely blind, save myself. I was only half blind.

"After the dinner, we repaired to the drawing room where the men, all sons of noble birth, asked me to explain to them why America went dry.

"In an hour's talk I tried as best I could, to draw aside the veil and reveal to them the mind of the Americans of their own class who, placing the welfare of their country higher than they did their facilities for getting a drink, worked for the prohibition of the liquor traffic.

"I have never talked to a more appreciative company. At the close, Sir Arthur arose and, leaning against the mantel of the fireplace, said a few things out of the bottom of his heart. As near as I can recall, he closed with these words:

" 'I don't know how you fellows feel about this business, but as for me, this is my mind: if the question of prohibition ever comes to a distinct issue in England, I am going to work and vote dry and help to abolish the whole business, my glass along with the others'.

"To my astonishment, nearly all of the fellows around the fireplace responded heartily, 'Hear! Hear!'

"It was most impressive. Here were twenty-five young men of high culture, who enjoyed the good things of life, who gladly gave their eyesight for their country and who were equally willing to give up their glass for the common good.

"What a lofty view of life! Such a spirit spells great things for the future of the world."

"But mothers know and understand. God has put a little tabernacle, a holy of holies, in the depths of their souls, which makes them tenderly, lovingly, understand their children. So, remember, son, that the Infinite, through me, your mother, is answering you on this, your wonderful new birthday when life is rich, opportunity abundant, and hope everywhere —and yet, the profound mystery of living is dimming your vision, your perceptions.

" 'How far is it up to God,' my son? Why, your young, pure, rhapsodical, fun-loving self is the temple of God. Your tender heart, your active brain, your merry smile, your bubbling laughter, your dancing feet all reflect God.

The Colleges Should Be the Vanguard

By William A. Shanklin, LL.D.
President Wesleyan University

The issue today joined over the Eighteenth Amendment is one of fundamental difference between the better element of the American population and the worst element, many of whom are alien in thought and speech.

It is not a case of whether a man shall or shall not be permitted to drink, but whether a lawless element in our population shall be able to defy the will of the majority. It is now up to true Americans to defend our national honor and institutions.

In support of the laws of the land —all laws—every law—the colleges should be the vanguard.

"Just so long as you are clean, wholesome, upright, honest and loving, look any man, woman or child in the face and say, 'I did the very best I could,' just so long God is in you, is templed by the heart of you; is honored by the blood of you and is not afar.

"But if you defile your body, soil the marvelous handiwork of the Creator by one unclean thought or word; or in any way desecrate the vital, Divine-given instincts of life—then God is 'far' off.

"What I am trying to tell you, dear, is to be clean—clean in the biggest, best sense of the word. Your body, the you that I know, is too glorious, too grand a creation to be soiled or smudged. Guard it, protect it by all that's brave and true in you. Don't for one instant let the 'Temple of God' be polluted by an act, word or thought.

"Listen, son: when you were tiny, oh, the very smallest thing that ever was, I loved you; shared my heart-beats with you. When you were a bit larger, but still very small, I guarded you at your bedside during the long darkness of night. I taught your baby feet to walk... Isn't it funny?... Once your feet were no bigger than a good-sized nose, and the most wobbly, tumbly things imaginable. Then you trusted me to help and guide you over the stumbly places. When it was dark—and you were afraid of the dark—you put your small hand in mine and were at once unafraid.

"So now, son, can't you trust me to guide you over this hubbly place, this uncertain, doubtful estate with pitfalls and temptation all around?

"Yes,— I know you are safe. My prayer is reaching out to you now. On the waves of an eternal love it is being borne to you, and you are remembering that you are the 'Temple of the Living God.'

"And now, son, good-night. Although other hands embrace you, other arms enfold you, believe, dear, that love is eternal; that out of the shadows of perplexity my love comes to help you. On the dizzy heights of treachery and the miry places of loneliness my love is holding you fast. So, again, dear, good-night—and remember, that as you are the dwelling place of God and I am with God, we are really nearer to each other than ever before.

"Once more, I whisper: sweet dreams, laddie; a glorious tomorrow.

"Mother."

Galen folded the letter carefully, pressed his lips to its sweet-scented surface and slipped it back into the envelope.

Holding the message tightly, his fingers closed over its preciousness with an eager, determined grasp. The tears would persist in coming, he just couldn't help it; but really, they were tears of joy for his heart kept ringing, ringing joyously as he whispered:

"Mother mine, I love you as never before! And if for no other reason than that I am the son of you, I'll keep my honor bright, and remember always to be clean... clean for God— and you."

A Surprise Meeting

(Adapted)

Announce a surprise meeting, with surprise speakers, surprise music and surprise refreshments, and ask for a surprise collection with which to subscribe to THE UNION SIGNAL for schools, libraries, churches, and other public institutions.

The speakers may be from away, some "big" person whom you are particularly fortunate in securing, or one of the members. Let the surprise music be furnished by members of the L. T. L. or the Y.P.B., or have music by outside talent.

The surprise refreshments may consist of grapes, wafers, dates, candy or things of that sort, put up in boxes apparently from the local ice-cream parlor. In the top of each may be put half of a clipping from THE UNION SIGNAL, these to be "matched." A march may be played while the guests pass by the table and take the boxes. Among the refreshments, each may find a further surprise in the shape of a tiny candy potato, beet, carrot, or bean. The hostess or waiter should ask each guest whether she prefers tea, coffee, or cocoa, and each should be brought a cup of cold water, whatever is ordered.

While the collection is being taken ask each guest to give some reason why THE UNION SIGNAL should be taken by each member.

"Where Did You Get That Information?"

To Ye Editor of The Union Signal:

At the Ladies' Aid, the other day,
Mrs. Asa Brown took particular note
Of the little bow of ribbon white
That I always wear, and said to me,
"I believe I'm right in assuming that you
Are an enthusiastic member
Of the W. C. T. U."
I smiled and quickly answered "Yes."
"I see," continued Mrs. Brown,
"They're out to win a million dollars,
Expect to win a million members;
Now will you kindly tell me what
They're going to do when they reach this goal?"
Upon hearing which, Mrs. Carrie Smith
Remarked, "I'd really like to belong
To an organization a million strong,
But blest if I join until I learn
How all this money is going to be used,
Prohibition is an accomplished fact,
So, of course, it isn't going for that."
Here I dropped my needle in nervous haste
And looked for it upon my dress,
Under the table, and on the floor,
And all the while kept searching my brain,
But could not find the facts I sought.

But Providence was more than kind.
Along came chatty Mrs. Black,
Listened a moment, chimed in and said,
"Do let me tell you about this fund
Of blessed dollars, that will travel round
The whole wide world and carry the tale
Of the wonders that prohibition has wrought."
Deftly and lightly she sketched the work
That is carried on as a labor of love
In China, Burma and sunny Japan,
South America, India, and other lands.
Then told of all that is being done
In our own country, for mother and child,
And also the stranger from over the seas.

Spellbound and thrilled those women sat
And ere Mrs. Black had closed her tale
Each took her purse and from its folds
Drew forth a brand-new dollar bill
And eagerly asked if she couldn't join
This wonderful movement, of world-wide scope.

Dumb as an oyster, all the while I sat,
But just as soon as the two ladies left
I marched straight over to Mrs. Black
And whispered, "Tell me where you get
All this information that I sadly lack."
She laughed and said, "THE UNION SIGNAL, dear,
It only costs one-fifty a year."

I did not wait for the ice-cream and cake,
But put on my wraps, to the postoffice rushed
And purchased an order
For a dollar and a half.
I enclose it herewith. Send the paper with speed!
I'm fully convinced it's just what I need,
And when next someone pauses to question me,
Prepared with an answer I surely shall be.

Respectfully,
A W. C. T. U. Member.

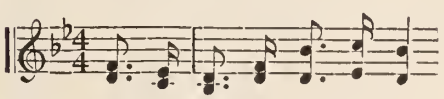
Read, Oh, Read The Union Signal

(Tune: "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp")



From Headquarters in the West

From Headquarters in the West
Comes the paper we love best,
And from Plymouth Rock unto the Golden Gate
THE SIGNAL travels day by day,
Ever teaching on its way,
Spreading victory news in every loyal state.

REFRAIN

On, on, on, it sends its message
Sounding out the Jubilee,
Blow the trumpet loud and long,
Join us in the triumph song,
'Till the echoes shall be heard across the sea.

Read, oh, read THE UNION SIGNAL
Help to pass the news along;
Not alone from coast to coast
In the land we love the most
But until the whole world echoes with our song.

Overcoming Mrs. Smith's Objections

"Isn't it perplexing," cordially agreed Mrs. Brown, "the way the time slips away before one's program for the twenty-four hours is half accomplished. I sometimes wonder if hours and days haven't shrunk since we were children. I can remember as a little girl, that my mother used to do her own cooking—and exceptionally fine it was, too,—and sometimes her washing and ironing, and yet find time to make dresses for me and my sisters, but she was never too busy, I recall vividly, to attend the W. C. T. U. meetings, and the missionary gatherings, and to read THE UNION SIGNAL and the church paper from cover to cover; and in between she found time to do such a lot of neighborly acts to the poor and the sick and the needy. And yet we modern women with our electric washing machines, and electric irons, and vacuum cleaners, and telephones over which to order our supplies, and automobiles to take us hither and thither, don't have time to do the really worth while things that our mothers never omitted. Isn't it strange?"

Mrs. Smith's face was serious and thoughtful. "But you see we have so many more periodicals and magazines than they had in their day, Mrs. Brown. Don't you think we get practically all we would find in THE UNION SIGNAL in our other papers?"

"If you do, I'd like to know their names," continued Mrs. Brown quickly. "I don't know them. For instance, among the papers on your list have you any that gives in a nut-shell the really worthwhile happenings in Congress, as does our Washington Letter in THE UNION SIGNAL.

"And, then, of course, nowhere else do you get the fascinating stories of our W. C. T. U. work in other countries, Asia, Africa, South America, Europe and the islands of the sea. As to child welfare and Americanization, women in industry and social morality, medical temperance and scientific temperance—all up-to-date subjects upon which every intelligent woman wants to be informed—where will you find a weekly paper that will cover all this ground in short, snappy articles. If you will tell me the paper that will compare with THE UNION SIGNAL in these respects, I'll subscribe this very minute."

But by this time Mrs. Smith had her check book and fountain pen ready for action.

"I didn't know you could be so eloquent, Mrs. Brown," she remarked as she tore out a check for a year's subscription, and handed it to her visitor, "I haven't a fragment of an argument left. You have convinced me thoroughly, and I shall not only take THE UNION SIGNAL, but I shall find the time, as did my blessed mother, to read and study it; and what is more, Mrs. Brown, I'm going to attend the W. C. T. U. meetings regularly, even if I never go to another movie in my life."

"You make me very happy, Mrs. Smith," said Mrs. Brown cordially. "I have coveted you with your gifts and enthusiasm as an active, whole-hearted worker in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and I know if you read THE UNION SIGNAL every week you will find its appeal for service irresistible."

What Would You Say?

(Answers to questions in THE UNION SIGNAL for January 19.)

1. The United States, Iceland and Finland have national prohibition. Eight of the nine provinces in Canada have prohibition. Liquor with an alcoholic content of more than fourteen per cent is prohibited in Norway.

2. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union is organized in more than forty countries.

3. At the last World's W. C. T. U. convention, the following officers were elected: President, the Countess of Carlisle, London; vice president, Miss Anna A. Upon the death of Lady Carlisle last August, Miss Gordon assumed the presidency until the next election, which will take place at the World's Convention in Philadelphia next November.

4. The work of the World's W. C. T. U. is supported by the payment annually into the World's Treasury of an amount not less than one cent or one-halfpenny per member of each local union, the memorial memberships, and special gifts or subscriptions.

Why Take the Union Signal?

Demonstration for eleven people, in costume.

It is well known that there are 9,999 good and sufficient reasons why every one of the 500,000 members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union should take THE UNION SIGNAL. We have selected some of the most important.

Reason No. 1

(Young woman, richly gowned, and if possible with lorgnette, counting her million dollars, some of which she drops upon the platform. In the same receptacle are quantities of pledge cards, which she is also counting.)

Speaker: It is my great privilege to introduce a very illustrious personage, one who rarely attends our gatherings —A MILLIONAIRE. Not an ordinary millionaire but a very fine type,—a W. C. T. U. Millionaire. She is the first and foremost reason why every one of the half million members of the W. C. T. U. should take THE UNION SIGNAL. Isn't she a beauty? Observe her carefully. Note how deftly she counts her million Jubilee dollars and her million Jubilee pledge cards—her members. Breathes there a woman in this audience with so little ambition that she, too, does not desire to be a Millionaire, a W. C. T. U. Millionaire? Would you really like to learn the secret of becoming a millionaire? LET THE UNION SIGNAL TELL YOU. Other periodicals may claim to be able to impart the secret. THE UNION SIGNAL alone can do it.

Now that we are in the midst of a Million Members Campaign, the Twenty Thousand Local Unions in the United States Cannot Afford to be without THE UNION SIGNAL.

Reason No. 2

(Scholarly young woman, wearing glasses, carrying a brief case and books. Comes in reading a book.)

Speaker: I present Reason No. 2, Miss Scientific Temperance Instruction, who for many years has been teaching the boys and girls in the public schools of our country the truth concerning the poison alcohol. As a result there grew up a generation of men and women who hated alcohol with such an intelligent hatred that they voted it out of the nation. And all the world looked on in admiration at the fine strategy of the women who had made possible the teaching of the truths of science in the public schools. So much for the glorious past. What of the future? To hold what we have gained, the 700,000 public school teachers must do as she has done and as intelligently, as conscientiously, as zealously teach what alcohol does to the brain, to the body, to the soul, that the present and the next generation may be as intelligent on this all important subject as was the last generation. How shall we insure such faithful teaching on the part of the 700,000 public school teachers? Go personally and individually to each one? We are too busy. LET THE UNION SIGNAL HELP! Send it with its wealth of material on scientific truth concerning alcohol each week into every school of every city. Let it be the reminder to the 700,000 teachers that they must give out this information and interpret the Eighteenth Amendment to their pupils and through them to the families of these pupils.

In view of the imperative need of the dissemination of scientific information on the alcohol question, the Twenty Thousand Local Unions of the United States Cannot Afford to be without THE UNION SIGNAL.

YOU NEED IT!

The confidence of many thousands is one factor that helps make the most popular and widely used tonic-food in the world.

Scott's Emulsion Builds Strength!

Scott & Bowne, Bloomfield, N. J. 20-53

Reason No. 3

Speaker: It is a very picturesque reason that I now present. She has just arrived from Ellis Island—a stranger in a strange land, and she feels very forlorn and craves the sympathy and friendship of the W. C. T. U. She has not been in America long enough to attend a W. C. T. U. Americanization class and learn the English language, and she asks me to speak for her, and to tell you that the story of her longing to become a genuine American and to have her children grow up to be true Americans in spirit and in loyalty to the United States is to appear in THE UNION SIGNAL during the coming months. Friends, this story of this foreign-born sister and the rest of the five million foreign-born women will be a fascinating serial. It will be a magic Million Members winner. Let THE UNION SIGNAL HELP YOU through this Americanization serial to gain your friends and neighbors.

For the sake of our five million and more New American sisters, every one of the Twenty Thousand Local Unions Ought to Take THE UNION SIGNAL.

Reason No. 4

Speaker: Isn't this young lady an entrancing, irresistible reason for gaining a Million Members and having every one of those Million Members take THE UNION SIGNAL? She is the very smallest of all the reasons but, paradoxical as it may seem, she is also the very biggest reason. And she is only one of 25,000,000. Some of them are brown and some of them are black, but most of them are white, and they are all adorable, and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union through its Child Welfare department is trying to safeguard them before birth and after birth, and all through childhood, so that they may develop perfectly physically and intellectually and spiritually. If the mothers of the United States could know what we are doing for the children, they would not wait for an invitation to become members of the W. C. T. U., they would be clamoring at our doors day and night, begging the privilege of joining. Comrades, LET THE UNION SIGNAL HELP YOU to tell of our work for the children.

The Twenty Thousand Local Unions of the United States Cannot Afford to be without THE UNION SIGNAL.

Reason No. 5.

Speaker: Number 5 is a very busy reason. She could hardly spare the time to come to this meeting, but she has an hour or two off so she is here. She represents a great army of 12,000,000 women in the industrial world, who are earning not only their own living but in many cases supporting families. Isn't she efficiency personified? Wouldn't you like to make her acquaintance and that of the rest of the 12,000,000? Of course you would, and what is more it is your bounden duty to make her acquaintance, and to know the conditions under which she works, what wages she is receiving, whether fair and just, and to know whether she is being properly protected by adequate legislation. But how can you, a busy woman, learn all these facts essential as they are for you to know? LET THE UNION SIGNAL HELP YOU to learn about the great army of women in the industrial world through the illuminating articles on this subject that will be published the coming year.

For the sake of the working sisterhood 12,000,000 strong the Twenty Thousand Local Unions Cannot afford to be without THE UNION SIGNAL.

Reasons No. 6 and 7

Speaker: Reason No. 6 and Reason No. 7 I will present together. They are the individuals who are going to carry on the work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union long after we older women have passed on to the other world. When we have gained our great objective—a Million Members—and when we have our family circle of a Million Members, as we sit around our Million Members fireside there will be something of vivacity and joy and enthusiasm and exuberance missing if there is not in that family circle a large company of young people. What's the use of being a Millionaire anyway if you don't have somebody to whom to leave your millions, someone who shall use those millions to perpetuate and develop and promote the work you have begun? But to gain the young people and the children we must magnify the Young People's branch and the Loyal Temperance Legion Branch. How to do this in your city and in mine is a serious question. LET THE UNION SIGNAL HELP. LET THE YOUNG CRUSADER HELP. Arouse the older women of your union by telling them through THE UNION SIGNAL of the magnificent men and women, who are today in our legislatures, in our colleges, in our business world, in our world-wide missionary enterprises, who were trained in the Loyal Temperance Legion or Young People's Branch. Make them realize that if they neglect this important work they will have no one trained to succeed them as leaders in the W. C. T. U. when they must lay down their work.

(Young woman in street costume, decorated with overskirts, etc., of real ballots, one of which she must be reading and marking as she comes in.)

Speaker: Election day must be near at hand, judging by the appearance of this young woman, whom it is my privilege to introduce to you as Reason No. 8 why every one of the half million members of the W. C. T. U. should take THE UNION SIGNAL. Reason No. 8, permit me to explain, is a thoroughly informed woman voter. If there is anything under the sun you want to know about why to vote, how to vote, when to vote, where to vote, and what and whom to vote for, ask her and she can tell you. The explanation is that for years she has been a regular subscriber to and a reader of THE UNION SIGNAL. Would that her more than 25,000,000 sister voters were equally well equipped for their civic duties. LET THE UNION SIGNAL HELP TO PREPARE THEM. Get them to take and read it, with its illuminating Washington Letter, telling each week of Federal legislation, with its special correspondence telling of state legislation, wiith its informing articles and its home study course on the duties of citizenship, and the principles of civil government.

Facing as we do the responsibility of instructing the 25,000,000 women voters in the United States, you will agree with me that the Twenty Thousand Local Unions of this country cannot afford to be without THE UNION SIGNAL.

(Motherly individual, carrying World Baby. Use good sized world globe for head. Dress in baby clothes. Have two nursing bottles, one filled with milk, the other with water. Use a big white ribbon bow as a hair ribbon on the baby's head.)

Speaker: I shall now introduce a visitor of world-wide reputation as Reason No. 9 why every one of the half million members of the W. C. T. U. should take THE UNION SIGNAL. We are honored in having with us this individual. In our childhood we were thrilled by the story of Atlas carrying the world on his shoulder. But this tale sinks into insignificance in the light of present day history, for the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is carrying the World on her heart, yes, in her arms, is mothering the poor, half starved, anaemic, feverish world. Did you ever stop to think why this poor world is half starved, anaemic, and feverish? One reason is that it has not had the proper sort of diet. It has been fed on the whisky bottle, the brandy bottle, the champagne bottle, the beer bottle, the wine bottle. Give the W. C. T. U. a chance to feed it on a thoroughly hygienic diet,—the milk bottle and the water bottle. (Here the bottles should be applied to the mouth of the infant.) Comrades, for this great task of "mothering" the world, we need a million mother-hearted women, with missionary intelligence, with missionary zeal. To gain them and to train them for this big task, LET THE UNION SIGNAL HELP. Let the official paper help you to secure these women for our missionary enterprise, by interesting them in the wonderful work we are doing in China, in Japan, in India, in Burma, in South America, in Europe, in Africa, in the uttermost parts of the world.

In the light of the tremendous, stupendous world problem we have to meet, the Twenty Thousand Local Unions cannot afford to be without THE UNION SIGNAL.

Reason No. 10
Law Violation

Speaker: I am taking a great responsibility in introducing the next individual, Reason No. 10, and I do it with fear and trembling, for he is a most disreputable, unpatriotic, disloyal creature of the baser sort, unworthy to associate with the high-minded, public-spirited individuals who have preceded him. You recognize him. His name is Law Violation, but he is masquerading under many respectable and high-sounding aliases. You may have heard of him as "National Order of Sphinx", or "Self Determination League of Liberty" or "Anti-Blue Law League of America Incorporated" or "National Liberty Party" or "One Hundred Per Cent American Spirit League." I am bringing him before this gathering because he is one of the major reasons why we should mobilize our Million Members and see that those Million Members are kept informed, through THE UNION SIGNAL, of the way this villain is organizing his forces, financed by the ex-brewers and the ex-distillers, to repeal the Volstead Act, and do away with the Eighteenth Amendment. No country ever made a greater contribution to the happiness and the prosperity of the world than did the United States when it placed in its Constitution a provision for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages. Today other nations are eagerly, yea, anxiously watching to see if we can make of the law a national success. What we do with this criminal, Law Violation, within the next few months, is a matter of vital importance not only to our nation but to all the nations of the world. What shall we do with him? Shall we not mobilize a Million Members and through THE UNION SIGNAL, placed in their hands, keep them informed of his deep-laid schemes to defeat the workings of our law; shall we not furnish these Million Members each week with the ammunition—facts, facts, FACTS, to counteract the falsehoods he has put in circulation. Through a Million Members, made intelligent and all powerful through reading THE UNION SIGNAL, we shall banish this traitor from our land forever and forever.

(At these words Law Violation must slink away, and as he disappears, Law Enforcement—a young woman, attired somewhat after the order of the Goddess of Liberty, in white, carrying a big flag steps into the place where he stood.)

Speaker (continuing): Having forever banished from our shores this traitor, we will enthrone Law Enforcement in our hearts, and in our homes, in the high places of the government, and under her beneficent rule our nation shall become a prohibition lighthouse, that shall illumine the pathway for all the nations of the world.

Comrades, in this great emergency, CAN THE TWENTY THOUSAND LOCAL UNIONS OF THE UNITED STATES AFFORD TO BE WITHOUT THE UNION SIGNAL?

THE UNION SIGNAL SOLILOQUIZES

Della Withers, Circulation Manager

What's it all about? Oh, yes, I know, it's a Membership Drive. It has started in real earnest. At a W. C. T. U. meeting at the home of one of the old-time members today, I listened to the strangest talk.

Someone said, "It is so difficult to get folks interested." Another declared: "People don't think nowadays." A third suggested that the public wants to enforce the laws and help but does not know how to do it.

There I lay on the table. At first I was so indignant. I knew I could get people interested by giving them facts. I knew I could make the public think and in the right way, too; and if the public wanted to enforce the laws, I could tell them the very best way to proceed. I wanted to scream out, "Let me help, let THE UNION SIGNAL help!" I couldn't seem to make myself heard. So I stared and stared, thinking they might feel my gaze and stare back and then think of me. Just then the funniest thing happened. A wind sprang up and came puffing in at the window, fluttered my pages a moment, and the first I knew I was on the floor before the whole crowd.

The dear lady I go to every week saw me first, and right away she said, "I have it! How many here take THE UNION SIGNAL, read it and follow its suggestions?" There was gloomy, thick silence.

"Ah! That's our trouble," she continued. "We have to be interested ourselves if we wish to interest others. We have to think, if we wish to get others to think. We must know what to do before we can direct others. Let us here and now subscribe for THE SIGNAL."

Someone made a remark about funds being low. "Oh," said my lady, "you haven't noticed the 'Ten Ways to Raise Money' published in THE UNION SIGNAL. I'll read them to you." And she did. My, what a different crowd. You could just feel the enthusiasm. They subscribed for their Trio-Team and several others gave names. Some promised to secure a list of subscribers March 1, UNION SIGNAL Day.

That night I lay on the table by the side of a book—so happy I began laughing and couldn't stop. "What on earth is the matter with you?" said the book. I replied: "Do you believe in signs?" "No," said the book. "Well," I said, "I do, when they are signs of waking up. I'll prophesy this union will go over the top in the Membership Drive and do it easily." "How do you know?" said the book. "Because they will have me to help." "Talk about conceit!" exclaimed the book. It isn't conceit to know, and to know that one knows and has proven it. Now is it? Won't you please let me help?

Your answer to this question you will have an opportunity to give to the solicitors for your subscriptions who will now pass down the aisles.

"Subscribe, Subscribe, Subscribe" may be sung to the tune of "Auld Lang Syne" while the ten reasons who have stood in a semi-circle on the platform, (being called out for introduction one by one), retire to the back of the stage, and if desirable, help in securing subscriptions from the audience.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

THE SENATE AND THE BUDGET—MORE THAN HALF THE STATES APPLY FOR BENEFITS OF MATERNITY AND INFANCY ACT—MANY WOMEN IN GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS—U. S. ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL, A WOMAN, IN CHARGE OF PROHIBITION PROSECUTIONS—TREASURY APPROPRIATION BILL CARRIES FUND FOR ARCHIVES SITE—DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

This week the President assembles the Senate and House leaders around the dinner table at the White House to discuss the program of legislation for this session of Congress. The agenda has not yet been announced, but the completion of the debt refunding, the soldier bonus, a tariff measure, legislation for relief of agriculture, including the co-operative marketing bill, are all expected. The regular appropriation bills must be passed and additional legislation upon which the attention of the legislators will be concentrated will probably depend largely upon public demand. The desire for adjournment in early summer is evident, and the dispatch with which the House is doing its work makes this seem a possibility, although the experienced in Congress realize that the time of adjournment is very uncertain.

THE SENATE AND THE BUDGET

Senator Francis E. Warren of Wyoming has introduced a resolution in the Senate which would give the Appropriation Committee jurisdiction over all the money bills.

In working out the new budget system, a new condition has developed which has seemed to make necessary action suggested in the Warren resolution. Before the Budget Bill became a law, the House, in anticipation, ordered a concentration of all appropriation bills under one committee and handled the bills in this way even before the Budget Bill was finally adopted. The Senate, however, had retained the rule which distributed appropriation bills among various committees. For instance, appropriations for the Navy went to the Naval Affairs Committee; for the Army to the Military Affairs Committee; for the postal service to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, etc.

Unquestionably, the scattering of the bills among the various committees has led to extravagance and lack of co-ordination. While the full Senate is final judge of all items, it cannot be expected to exercise the same comprehensive study of the bills as would one committee especially experienced in handling these measures. Judging from the admirable way in which the budget plan is working out in the House in point of thoroughness of consideration and speed of action, the adoption of the Senate resolution will probably be demanded for the sake of more efficient demonstration of the new law.

MORE THAN HALF THE STATES APPLY FOR BENEFITS OF MATERNITY AND INFANCY ACT

Before the Federal act passed, the following states by legislative act had provided for co-operation with the Federal government in the promotion of the welfare and hygiene of maternity and infancy: Delaware, Minnesota, New Hampshire and New Mexico.

Oregon has passed legislation since the passage of the bill by Congress.

The governors of these states have sent to the Children's Bureau formal acceptance: Alabama, Arizona, Colorado, Arkansas, Connecticut, Iowa, Idaho, Kansas, Michigan, Missouri, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, Wisconsin, Wyoming.

Last winter the South Dakota legislature passed a resolution to co-operate, providing the Federal act passed Congress "in its present form." Since the bill was changed in some of its provisions this state must make a new application through the governor or state legislature.

MANY WOMEN IN GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS

Nearly 50,000 women work for the Government in Washington, many of them occupying positions of large responsibility. On the records of the Department of Justice are the names of many women acting as deputy United States marshals, with full power to make arrests and carry weapons. In several states women are acting as assistant district attorneys.

Women, therefore, are coming to have a very important part in many sections of the United States in the framing of laws and in the administration of Federal statutes.

UNITED STATES ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL, A WOMAN, IN CHARGE OF PROHIBITION PROSECUTIONS

Mrs. Mabel Walker Willebrandt is Assistant Attorney General of the United States and has sole charge of prosecutions under Federal prohibition laws.

Miss Mary Anderson, head of the Woman's Bureau of the Department of Labor, ranks with hundreds of men who occupy positions similar to hers as chiefs of bureaus. All appointments to the positions of bureau chiefs must be considered by the Senate.

In a recent campaign to survey profiteering, in the Department of Justice, women investigators played a very important part. As detectives, women have been tried out by the Federal Trade Commission, Department of Justice, and United States Shipping Board, all of which maintain detective forces.

GENERAL FEDERATION OF WOMEN'S CLUBS PURCHASES WASHINGTON HEADQUARTERS

Announcement has been made by the General Federation of Women's Clubs of the purchase for $70,000 of a permanent headquarters in Washington. The house chosen, one of unusual dignity and beauty, is in the immediate vicinity of the British Embassy, the National Education Association, and the National Geographic Society.

The generosity of a small number of club women has provided a loan that will enable an initial payment of $20,000 this month. It is not proposed to levy assessments or lay quotas on clubs or states, but to ask for voluntary gifts to pay for this new headquarters.

TREASURY APPROPRIATION BILL CARRIES FUND FOR ARCHIVES SITE

Provision for a national archives building here, in which valuable Government records may be protected from fire or other damage, is contained in a Senate amendment to the Treasury Appropriation Bill, which has passed the Senate and now is in conference. The amendment makes an appropriation of $500,000 for the purchase of a site, which included $25,000 for technical service.

SENATE PASSES BILL FOR RAILROAD MILEAGE BOOKS

The Senate has passed a bill, directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to order railroads to issue mileage books. The measure will leave to this Commission authority to prescribe "just and reasonable rates." As passed, the measure was a substitute for the original bill, which provided for 5,000 mileage books at two and one-half cents per mile. An amendment provides for books to be from 1,000 to 5,000 miles. The measure goes to the House.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS

Continuing the 60-40 proportion between the District and Federal governments for paying the bills of the National Capital, the District Appropriation Bill for the fiscal year starting July 1 next, carrying recommendations for appropriations totaling $20,397,779.80, as compared with $23,001,566.74 appropriated for the current fiscal year, and $26,888,366.75 estimated by the Budget Bureau, has been reported to the House.

The Appropriations Committee recommends continuance of the present rate of taxes at not less than one and one-half per cent, nor more than two per cent.

ANTI-LYNCHING BILL PASSES HOUSE

The Dyer Anti-Lynching Bill was passed by the House this week by a vote of 230 to 119. The bill goes to the Senate.

A STEP IN GOVERNMENT REORGANIZATION PLANS NOTED

President Harding is studying the Government and bureau reorganizing plans which have been placed before him by Walter F. Brown, chairman of the Joint Congressional Commission, charged with the task. The plans have not been made public in detail, pending the consideration of them by the President, the Joint Commission, the Cabinet, and their transmission to Congress. The suggestions are considered preliminary in nature. Some of the proposed transfers are as follows:

The Bureau of Good Roads and Markets from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of Commerce; the Forest Service from the Department of Agriculture to the Interior Department; the Patent Office and the Bureau of Education from the Department of the Interior to the New Public Welfare Department; the Coast Guard Service from the Treasury to the new Department of National Defense, a combined Department of the War and Navy Departments; and the consolidation of all the secret service agencies of the Government in the Department of Justice.

Poland Adopts Prohibitory Law

Beer containing more than two and one-half per cent alcohol is to be forbidden in Poland, according to a press dispatch. The alcohol law passed by the diet the last of January places the ban on beer of higher alcohol content, limits drinking places to one per 2,500 population, prohibits saloons, licensing only cafes and restaurants, makes proprietors liable to arrest in the case of drunkenness on their premises, and places a tax of 20 per cent on all liquor stocks.

A stiff fight in the diet preceded the passage of the measure, the wet forces presenting lengthy arguments against it.

The victory for the drys is attributed largely to the activites of the seven women deputies.

Prohibition Brings Rehabilitation of Homes

"The results of prohibition have been beneficial to the American nation, especially in bringing about the rehabilitation and reconstruction of the American home," said Dr. W. W. Keen, famed Philadelphia surgeon, on the recent occasion of his eighty-fifth birthday, according to the Philadelphia North American. "Instead of spending money on whisky in the saloon," he continued, "the head of the family is now concerned with its needs, buying clothes, adorning the house, and looking after the children. The workman is making his home a fit place in which to live.

"Prohibition has been successful, even though in many cases administered by its enemies. If its friends were at the helm of prohibition enforcement there would be less violation.

"And yet, prohibition will never be entirely enforced. Here's the analogy. There is strong prohibition against murder. Punishment for murder is provided by electric chair and hanging. Yet there are murders committed. So it will always be. There is prohibition against stealing and thieving. Yet crime is rampant. There is strong prohibition against cheating. Yet lately we have seen where there has been lots of cheating of gullible people by crooks."

The prevalence of crime Doctor Keen attributes to post-war conditions.

Prohibition Year a Health Year

With the coming of the new year statistics are being compiled showing the achievements during the year just closed. One report of particular interest is that made by Robert Fox, vice-president of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company of New York, who states that this last year is the healthiest ever experienced. In the United States and Canada there were more than 150,000 fewer deaths this past year than in 1920, and Mr. Fox believes that the indications are that there has begun a material lengthening of the span of life in these two countries. He does not give credit to prohibition for the favorable showing, but that it is at least a factor one can hardly doubt.

Barley Now Makes Beef Instead of Beer

The Wisconsin Agriculturist says that since prohibition days have come there has been practically no reduction in the amount of barley raised by the farmers, but this does not go into beer brewing. Anticipating that the stoppage of the manufacture of malt liquors would to a great extent do away with the barley market, the Agricultural colleges of Illinois, Indiana, Iowa and Wisconsin long since began a series of tests to determine the feed value of the grain. These tests have demonstrated that barley is highly valuable as a stock feed. It is now extensively fed to cattle.

Chicago's Death Rate Drops During 1921

Chicago has just finished its healthiest year, according to Health Commissioner Robertson. Vital statistics for 1921 showed a decrease in deaths of 4,505 as compared with 1920.

"Let us all band together not only to maintain this wonderful health record but to make it still lower," suggests Dr. Robertson. The old adage, "A stitch in time saves nine," is never more true than when applied to the human body.

WORKING FOR ENFORCEMENT

Fannie L. Taylor

W. C. T. U. members of Kansas City, Missouri, were invited by the police to witness the destruction of 200 gallons of home-made whisky and 25 stills, the accumulation of a two weeks' raid on bootleggers. Mrs. Fannie L. Taylor, president, Mrs. Ruth Womacks, recording secretary, Mrs. Carrie J. Kaysing, treasurer, Mrs. Rosa M. Webb, S. T. I. superintendent, Mrs. Carrie Maxey, Soldiers and Sailors superintendent, Mrs. T. F. Ridley, president of the Newton union, and Mrs. A. A. Stewart responded.

On arriving at the scene of action, the basement of police headquarters, the ladies were shown the many devices in the bootleggers' paraphernalia and given a history of many of the raids in which the police are now engaged in their efforts to "dry-clean" the city.

As the men began to demolish the contraband stills the W. C. T. U. group sang "Work for Enforcement Where You Are" and then "Praise God from Whom All Blessings Flow," the large group of spectators, including officers, removing their hats and reverently bowing their heads as the white ribboners raised their voices in gratitude.

When the work of emptying the booze began, the W. C. T. U.-ers were permitted to aid. As two hundred gallons of liquid poison streamed on the floor and into the sewer, the odor proved too strong for one white ribboner and she held her nose, the camera and "movie" man taking snapshots.

An officer said: "You temperance folks keep up your work and law violation will soon end. The situation is getting better."

Needless to say we told him we are standing on the lid as hard and as fast as we can.

STUDIES IN GOVERNMENT

LAW ENFORCEMENT

Deborah Knox Livingston, National Director Christian Citizenship

Law is the most sacred thing in Government and lawlessness the greatest menace to civilization. To violate law is to endanger the safety of all, for the welfare of society is dependent upon obedience to lawfully constituted authority. An act of disobedience on the part of one citizen encourages disrespect for all law and ultimately promotes criminality.

Law has always been accorded a certain measure of respect by the people of all nations, even though at times their laws were most unjust.

The basis of all law is found in the Ten Commandments, which were given by God on Mt. Sinai to the Jewish people. These Commandments constitute the foundation upon which the present structure of moral law in all lands has been builded. They deal first with the duty of man towards God, second, the duty of man towards his fellow man.

Our present form of law was taken from the English common law, which in its origin was an attempt to formulate the ancient inherited customs into rules which should hold alike in all parts of the country.

Law Defined

Law is a statement of the principles by which society is governed. The laws of the land are the rules and regulations which are necessary to define the civil and religious rights and liberties of the people.

Alexander Hamilton said, "The Constitution is itself in every rational sense and to every useful purpose a bill of rights." Protection of these rights and liberties, by the enactment of laws, is the highest function of government and is made possible by the Constitution.

There are three kinds of law:

Civil Law, which deals with the rights of the individual;

Criminal Law, which deals with crimes or wrongs against the state or community or the person of an individual.

Moral Law, which deals with moral questions, such as child labor, Sabbath observance, gambling, laws regulating or prohibiting the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors for beverage purposes.

Law Enforcement

Law has no inherent power by which it can enforce itself. Enforcement of law is dependent upon three factors; namely, public sentiment, honest officials, impartial administration.

Public Sentiment is created through the press, the pulpit and the lecture platform, by the printed leaflet, the poster, and in every way whereby an appeal can be made to the mind and heart of the people. In this way, discussion is secured and the necessary educational work is accomplished.

Honest officials is the great need for adequate enforcement of law. Only such officials as are known to be of personal integrity and ability to rise above partisan dictation should be elected to public office. Officials who honestly endeavor to enforce law should receive the support and commendation of all law-abiding citizens, and when officials are to be elected, personal qualifications should govern the choice rather than partisan prejudice.

Impartial Administration

Nothing will tend toward the repeal of law more surely than its partial enforcement. If a law is enforced against some people and other classes or groups are permitted to violate it with impunity, it will not last long, for the public resent anything that seems like injustice or class legislation.

12. What did Lincoln say concerning reverence for law?

Enforcement of the Prohibition Law

In the appointment of men whose business it is to enforce law, only such as are in sympathy with the law should be selected. Much of the gross violation of the prohibition law is due to the fact that many officials whose sworn duty it is to enforce the law are not in sympathy with the principle of prohibition and so permit its violation, in many instances even conniving with law breakers.

True patriotism is obedience to the law and order of the government, and the man or woman who in any degree violates the country's sacred laws is a traitor and should suffer the consequences of that violation. Unless our democracy is based on the principle of obedience to law, it dies and we have anarchy.

Liberty is the glory of our republic but license, which expresses itself in contempt for law and order, becomes our most deadly foe.

It is the duty of every citizen to take an active part in the political affairs of his local community as well as in the state and nation; and there is no greater challenge to the political life of our day than the challenge of law enforcement. The challenge must be met by an enlightened citizenship; by a revival on the part of its citizens of obedience to the law and order of our country; by the election to office of men and women who are not afraid to do their duty, irrespective of consequences, whether or not those consequences result in their political or social ostracism. The election of such officials is accomplished only by the combined efforts of all clean, decent and courageous citizens.

Lincoln gave us the great ideal when he said, "Let reverence for law be breathed by every American mother to the lisping babe that prattles on her lap; let it be taught in schools, in seminaries and in colleges; let it be written in primers, spelling books and in almanacs; let it be preached from the pulpit, proclaimed in legislative halls and enforced in courts of justice, and, in short, let it become the political religion of the nation."

WHAT THE GOVERNORS HAVE TO SAY ON PROHIBITION

People Must Be Educated to Respect Amendment

I feel that prohibition has had a very helpful influence in Colorado, which had prohibition before the national amendment was passed. I have long contended that law enforcement must wait upon public opinion and now that the liquor traffic as an organized and recognized institution has been abolished, the people of America must be educated to respect the Eighteenth amendment and the regulatory statutes which have been enacted for its enforcement. Prohibition can be made effective wherever the sentiment of the community favors enforcement.

O. H. SHOUP
Governor of Colorado

Prohibition Morally and Economically Right

I think that prohibition has had a very beneficial effect upon the state of Nebraska, and I believe that there is no general disposition here to desire a return to former conditions. Ultimately, I have no doubt that the American people, as a whole, will recognize prohibition as a movement that is morally and economically right.

SAMUEL R. MCKELVIE
Governor of Nebraska

Greatest Lever Is Education of Young

Prohibition has proven a great blessing to the people of Arizona since it became effective in January, 1915, and during that period the state has witnessed a most remarkable growth. In fact, the 1920 census disclosed that Arizona had made a greater percentage of gain in population than any other state in the union during the ten year period, and I am very sure that prohibition will be a permanent policy so far as the people of Arizona are concerned.

It is a deplorable fact that the attitude of some Americans toward prohibition is as we find it today. Instead of hearty compliance with its principles prohibition is lightly treated. Violations of the law, which are publicly condemned, are condoned in private.

The women of our nation can render notable service through bringing about a change in this attitude, awakening public opinion to the menace which the present loose attitude toward prohibition is producing toward all laws, and through emphasizing the sacred duty of every citizen not only to obey the letter of the law, but also its spirit.

Woman's greatest lever is, of course, education of the rising generation, and this, together with the constant exercise of her enormous influence in public affairs, will do much to bring about attainment of the condition which is so manifestly desirable.

T. E. CAMPBELL
Governor of Arizona

> The government will endure on the rock of law enforcement, or it will perish in the quicksands of lawlessness. Those who do not believe in our government and the enforcement of our laws should go to a country which gives them their peculiar liberty.
> —Hon. H. M. Daugherty,
> Attorney General of the U. S.

Eternal Vigilance Price of Every Reform

North Dakota has always been dry. When the state was admitted to the Union in 1889 and a constitution was adopted, a prohibition clause was a part of that constitution. Despite the many difficulties attending the enforcement of any law where the enforcer battles against the combined forces of men's appetites and men's greed, the people of North Dakota have never regretted the adoption of this provision of the constitution, and the sentiment for prohibition is steadily increasing.

Eternal vigilance is not only the price of Liberty but is also the price of every other reform that is instituted against the power of the embattled hosts which the prohibition forces have had to contend with everywhere.

When I first came to the state twenty-eight years ago, I talked with a great many people who had lived in the community both during the territorial days, when licensed saloons existed, and also during the period of statehood when the legalized saloon had been abolished, and they declared almost without exception that the improvement in the social and economic conditions, in the closer and better attention to both farming and business, was quite marked, and these men, even though they occasionally shipped in some liquors for their own consumption, contended that the general benefit from prohibition was such that if the question were ever again raised in this state, they would not only vote for prohibition but would contribute liberally to the cause.

Now that national prohibition has come, the advantage should become still more apparent. For a number of years this will not be so noticeable because the forces that oppose the movement for the sake of the great financial gains, augmented by the strength of those whose craving for the intoxicants is still so great as to outweigh every other consideration, will make the battle furious and it will take time before prohibition will have that body of public sentiment back of it which will insure its thorough enforcement. I am confident, however, that it has come to stay and I believe that the improvement in our industrial and economic life during the next decade will be so apparent that inside of a quarter of a century the opponents of the cause of prohibition will have become also its ardent supporters.

Liquor has always been an enemy and curse to the home, and it is to be expected that in this battle no class of people will more loyally uphold the prohibition amendment, and insist upon its enforcement, granting their personal help to those entrusted with the task, than the women of the land. By fighting for the maintenance and enforcement of the prohibition law, they will be contributing, in full measure, to the upbuilding of the institutions they love and to the success of which they have devoted so much of their life and strength.

R. A. NESTOS
Governor of North Dakota

Public Sentiment Must Be Aroused

The contest against the liquor iniquity is not yet crowned with complete success. On the contrary, the situation demands the utmost vigilance of all who earnestly desire a sober state and nation. The forces of evil are active and aggressive and there must be no abatement of the energy and watchfulness by which they are to be encountered. Every resource at the command of the commonwealth of Iowa is enlisted for the extirpation of the nefarious traffic, but in the last analysis there must be aroused a vigorous public sentiment for its utter overthrow.

N. E. KENDALL
Governor or Iowa

Prohibition Not An Issue in Kansas

The Volstead act has had no effect in Kansas, for the reason that we have had prohibition upon our statute books for over a quarter of a century, and for several years have had a bone-dry law. We are in the second generation of young men who never saw a saloon, and therefore the question of prohibition isn't an issue here any more. Kansas went through a great deal of the same sort of turmoil that New York and other wet states are now passing through. Every fracture of the law was hailed as a proof that the law was of no account. Every time some old soak smuggled in some booze and was captured at it, all the wet sympathizers said that proved that the law was increasing crime and making hypocrites out of honest men. But, in spite of that, public sentiment was growing steadily in favor of prohibition, the law was being strengthened by subsequent legislative acts, and prohibition won out in this state absolutely upon its merits as a business and moral issue.

HENRY ALLEN
Governor of Kansas

ENEMIES OF THE LAW ARE ENEMIES OF THE NATION

Hon. Guy D. Goff, Assistant to the U. S. Attorney General

No man in this country is so high that he is above the law, even though he may regard the rule or regulation as a personal affront. No officer of the law may set that law at defiance.

There is no greater evil today than the non-enforcement by public officials of laws which they have sworn to uphold. It is not for an executive, state or federal, to say whether a law is good or bad. He should enforce it, or confess failure and resign. Society cannot progress without respect for authority and order, and the individual cannot make progress without that protection and security which respect for the law insures. Strong as this government is, it is not strong enough to last unless the American citizen is taught and—if needs be—made to respect authority and obey the law.

In the great field of law enforcement our difficulties are incredible. Not only are the criminal classes insolently bold, but hitherto law-abiding citizens find it convenient to forget the law. This is true particularly of the prohibition law.

POSTER LESSONS — DIFFERENT DRINKS BUT THE SAME AMOUNT OF ALCOHOL

Cora Frances Stoddard, National Director Scientific Temperance Investigation

(Suggestions for teaching material in connection with the poster bearing the foregoing title in school class work, in shop talks, or in public addresses.)

The Kind of Drink Is Less Important Than the Amount of Alcohol Taken In It

Place on the blackboard the following table:

Beer contains 3½ to 5 per cent alcohol by volume.

Wine contains 6 to 23 per cent alcohol.

Whisky contains 42 to 47 per cent alcohol.

Show comparative sizes of the glasses in which, before prohibition, these drinks were ordinarily sold in the United States, viz., beer glass, 9-12 ounces; wine glass, two ounces; whisky glass, one ounce.

As an arithmetic problem compute the amount of alcohol at 3½, 4, and 4½ per cent in 9, 10, and 12 ounce glasses of beer; in 2 and 3 ounce glasses of wine at 8, 10, 13, 19 and 23 per cent; in a one ounce glass of whisky at 42 and 47 per cent. Translate these amounts into terms of the familiar tablespoonful (half an ounce).

Emphasize the facts:

1. That because the wine, beer or cider drinker uses a larger quantity of his beverage he may easily drink in a day or an evening as much as or more alcohol than the whisky drinker.

2. That it is the same drug alcohol in all these drinks, in the lighter as well as in the stronger.

Alcohol Weakens Self-Restraint

Glasses ordinarily used hold enough of these drinks to weaken the natural self-restraint of a person not accustomed to them. Weakened self-restraint sometimes results in readier speech; it is called "loosening the tongue" and is one of the arguments used for social drinking. Alcohol does set most people to talking more glibly, and, for a few minutes makes them more animated and more inclined to talk.

This effect of alcohol is frequently looked upon as amusing, but it ought not to be so regarded. The man who walks in a queer fashion because he has injured a leg is not laughed at; he is pitied. The man who talks in a queer fashion because he has injured his brain with alcohol should not be regarded as funny; he too should be pitied. He is in the first stage of alcoholic poisoning or intoxication. While it lasts, he is liable not only to say foolish things, but to quarrel without excuse, and to act in other ways than would be allowed by his judgment if it were not weakened by this slight benumbing of the brain by the poison.

Weakened Self-Restraint Makes It Easy to Take More Drink

If no more drinks are taken, the effects pass off in a little while, but while they last, the drinker is in greater danger of taking another drink than if he had his normal power of self-restraint. The temptation to refill the glasses is especially present when people are drinking in company. They urge each other to drink again. Refusal is ridiculed as a sign of weakness or fear. Those who might in their normal condition have the courage to ignore such teasing are more likely to yield under the effects of the first glass.

Thus, a chief danger in taking a single glass of an alcoholic drink is its tendency to lead to a second glass or more. Other effects then become so apparent that all can see them and observers who are ignorant of the first effects of alcohol may condemn the drinker for not "knowing when he had enough." They are blaming him for not exercising self-control in using alcohol, one of whose first effects is to weaken that self-control. He ran this risk in taking the first glass.

Alcohol in All Alcoholic Drinks a Habit-Forming Drug

The secret of the habit-forming power of alcohol lies in the fact that the body gradually becomes accustomed to alcohol so that more and more must be taken to produce an effect that the user finds pleasure in, or to produce drunkenness. Thus Jack who has been drinking for some time boasts that he can get away with several drinks without getting drunk. This simply means that Jack's body has become so far accustomed to alcohol that it takes more than it once did to make him drunk.

But he is not escaping harm meanwhile. "Down among the cells and tissues" of his body other injury is being recorded. Such injury shortens the life of the drinker, makes certain diseases more fatal for him, makes him a less skillful and dependable worker, interferes with his ability to read and answer signals correctly, increases his danger from accidents. There are dozens of experiments proving the injury done by alcohol though the drinker never gets drunk.

By the time that Jack finds that he can take more than he could at first without getting drunk, he has another motive for drinking besides the desire to be social. The narcotic effect of alcohol—a benumbing of the sense of weariness—makes him think that he "feels good" after drinking; and, by removing restraints, that he feels gay or happy. Little by little more alcohol is required to produce this feeling. Just as he can drink larger amounts without getting drunk, so he has to drink larger amounts to get the feeling he wants, much as the user of narcotic drugs like morphin and opium has to take more and more of them to get their desired effect. And so before he realizes that alcohol has been producing this drug effect upon him, Jack goes on increasing the amount that he drinks, believing that as long as he never gets tipsy or but seldom does so, no harm is done.

Drunkenness Not the Measure of Harm Done by Alcohol

This fact should be thoroughly taught. Youth and adult should understand that alcoholic intoxication begins with the sense of gaiety and ease or well-being due to slight narcotizing by alcohol of the feeling of self-restraint. Drunkenness is the late stage when the narcotic effect of alcohol causes the drinker to lose control of his limbs, his speech, or stupefies him into unconsciousness. It is a narcotic effect from first to last, and this narcotic effect is the reason why alcohol in wine, cider, beer or whisky gets a grip on many a drinker which he finds difficult or impossible to throw off, and why safety lies in letting all drinks alone.

A Reason for Prohibition

This habit-forming power of alcohol is one reason why the law prohibits alcoholic drinks just as there are laws to prevent the sale of habit-forming drugs, such as morphin and opium.

WHO SAYS PROHIBITION IS A FAILURE?

III. ITS EFFECT UPON CRIME AND DELINQUENCY

Emma L. Transeau, Massachusetts Superintendent Scientific Temperance Instruction

It is generally recognized that wars are followed by crime waves. This has been the case in France and Germany since the great war and also in England where London policemen are reported to be carrying firearms for the first time in many years.

In the United States the influence of the war can be detected in a wide spread spirit of daring and bravado, but in spite of this and of the new traffic laws and ordinances which tend to swell the number of arrests, there has been no crime wave. Jail populations have decreased. The class of offenses in which alcohol is an inciting factor has shown a marked decline.

"There has been in our city a big decrease in crimes caused by booze," wrote a local justice to the secretary of the New York State Probation Commission. "Men heretofore before the court after a week-end spree are now working steadily and have extra money in their pockets instead of always being 'broke'!"

"Prohibition has made the police business dull compared with the old regime," stated another letter.

To present a complete picture of the effect of prohibition on crime would require much time and money. A large number of records, however, have been gathered from such varied and representative localities that they can not be charged with presenting biased results.

An extensive collection of records of jail populations for the years ending July 1, 1918, 1919 and 1920 was gathered early in 1921 by the M. E. Board of Temperance and published in its World Digest, March 26, 1921. The records came from 200 counties in 14 states, among which were: New York (23 counties), Pennsylvania (30 counties), Minnesota (34 counties), and similar proportions in California, Illinois, Massachusetts and the remaining smaller states.

Of these 200 counties, 100 were dry and 35 partly dry before national prohibition went into effect. This would tend to reduce the contrast, as the great falling off from the wet period had already occurred in these counties. The total jail population of these 200 counties on July 1, 1918, was 8,251; on July 1, 1919, it was 7,901, a difference of only 4 per cent. On July 1, 1920, at the end of the first dry year, it was 5,357, a decrease of 35 per cent from 1918 and of 32 per cent from the preceding wet year, ending July, 1919.

The figures of total arrests for all offenses have been collected from a number of large cities. In Boston these arrests reached their highest point in 1917, when

"EVILS" OF PROHIBITION

A circular has recently been received by the editors of the Portland (Oregon) Telegram purporting to show that prohibition is only a failure. In parallel columns are presented what prohibition promised and what it performed. The first list is: (1) Empty jails and the elimination of crime: (2) happier homes and a general uplifting of family conditions; (3) a richer nation; (4) improved labor conditions; (5) fewer cases for the courts; (6) better citizenship. The other list ascribes to prohibition such evils as "the greatest crime wave in the history of the nation"; "added friction between capital and labor"; "courts choked with more cases than ever before in history," and the like. The following statistics, however, will show that prohibition has already gone far toward fulfilling the promises made for it:

THE "CRIME WAVE" A pamphlet recently issued by the Indiana state board of charities states that at the close of the fiscal year, September 30, more than two-thirds of the county jails of the state were empty, while at the close of the preceding year one-third were empty, fourteen had but one inmate and six two inmates each. The statistics show a steady decrease in commitments since the coming of prohibition.

The records of the Cheyenne (Wyoming) police department show a steady decrease in the figures for all classes of arrests since the coming of prohibition, with the exception of gambling and opium cases. The totals (including these) are: 2,348 in 1918; 1,862 during the first six months of 1919, and 627 the last six ("dry") months; 1,020 in 1920. The figures for the first six months of 1921 were 692, showing an increase, but not as much as many expected since it was reported that there was far more bootlegging.

The figures for the Albany county (New York) penitentiary may be taken as typical of a wide section of the country, as it receives prisoners from seven other counties, all included in the report. The commitments have decreased from 1,120 in 1910 and 1,070 in 1915, to 173 in 1920. Of these only 6 were for drunkenness, less than one -twentieth.

HOME AND CHILDREN The school authorities of Columbus, Ohio, reported that there has been noticeable improvement in the living conditions of the Columbus school children, better attendance, less sickness and malnutrition, since the advent of the "dry" regime, according to the Columbus Dispatch. Compared with the increase in the enrollment, the children seem more thrifty, are dressed more warmly, and have less to say of troubles at home.

The Brooklyn (New York) board of charities states that prohibition has cut in half the number of cases of poverty and distress ascribable to drink, decreased the number of wife desertions, and has been instrumental in bringing down the unemployment and illness totals. Families have been rescued from almost chronic misery.

Robert A. Woods, social worker for Massachusetts, says that the greatest results of prohibition cannot be measured by statistics. "The greatest is found in countless homes," he asserts as quoted by the Christian Science Monitor. "Social workers throughout the state testify that families formerly handicapped in greater or less degree by the liquor habit have shown marked and general improvement. Indeed they hold that the greatest total benefit has come to the families of beer drinkers, of men who did not ordinarily become intoxicated, but did spend much time and money in the saloon, and neglected their families without abusing them. The half was not told on this matter in appeals for prohibition before it came in. Men not only cease neglecting their families and at times abusing them; they not merely begin to provide for them properly, but they become—and there are countless facts to support the statement—domestic beings once more, enjoying their homes, and treating the wife and children with affection."

> To me, this is the "Zero Hour" for our country and for humanity. As an American and a Christian, I think that God leads in this great advance. He calls upon us to fall in line—to keep close to the barrage—to take our place, and to do our duty. Let us so take our place—do our duty—step out with a splendid abandon of self, that when that All-seeing Eye scans the place where we should serve, we shall not be "missing."
> Federal Prohibition Commissioner Haynes

PROSPERITY Has prohibition caused bad business? Joseph Frankel, president of Makers of Men's and Boys' Apparel, in an interview in the Chicago Daily News declared that the retail clothing merchants sold more garments in October, 1921, than in any other corresponding month in the history of the clothing business. Mr. Frankel's observation was based on facts obtained on a tour of investigation covering the larger eastern cities, which he had just completed at the time of the interview.

"Jails are empty now where they used to be taxed to capacity," says J. A. Warren, an adjutant in charge of social work of the Salvation Army, as quoted by the El Paso (Texas) Herald. "Poorhouses are vacant, and homes where empty larders and broken furniture were mostly in evidence are now real homes, with happiness replacing the suffering of the saloon days."

The report of the bank commissioner for Massachusetts shows that in the year 1920, with its high cost of living, unemployment and general business depression, the people of that state had saved more money than in any previous year—$190,826,000. "That portion of the daily press which is hostile to prohibition, not content with giving disproportionate emphasis to violations of the law, too often disregards facts which clearly indicate the social and economic value of the law," said a dry worker, in pointing out the fact that this gain took place in a prohibition year, although prohibitionists did not claim that the Eighteenth Amendment was solely responsible therefor.

IMPROVEMENT OF LABOR CONDITIONS Says the Cedar Rapids Republican (Iowa), "So far as we have been able to observe, where one man now is disqualified for business as a result of drink there were at least ten under the saloon * * * The economic waste that used to result from fuddled brains, unsteady hands and quarrelsome dispositions has been very largely eliminated, and the output of industrial plants has been greatly improved."

The Lone Star Brewery of San Antonio, Texas, property of the Busch Interests of St. Louis, has been remodeled into a cotton mill. The plant is using twelve bales of Texas cotton daily, operates 505 machines and 375 looms, and gives employment to large numbers of men and women.

The Rochester Times-Union says that the manager of the American Window Cleaning Company, New York City, which supplies window washers, scrub women and janitors for office buildings, had his own troubles before prohibition. Drunken window cleaners were a menace to themselves and a handicap to the business, and it was hard to get sober ones. Scrub-women with a fondness for the bottle were the bane of his existence. He is thus quoted: "When I want a man now for a special cleaning job, I go to the lodging houses, and I can get willing, sober fellows anxious to earn a few dollars. It used to be they were nearly all drunk * * * No, you can't make me believe anything against prohibition. I've seen a lot of men and women die from booze—had a scrubwoman carried out of one of my buildings and taken to the alcoholic ward at Bellevue where she died. There is none of that sort of thing nowadays. They are all sober and saving and you can depend on them to stick to their jobs."

COURT CASES According to the survey made by the board of prohibition, temperance and public morals of the Methodist Church, "In Boston, prohibition brought about a decrease in the number of cases of assault from 2,127 to 1,673 in one year. In St. Louis, petit larceny declined from 6,167 to 3,503. We have it on the authority of the commissioner of police of the city of New York that in 1918 there were 11,611 burglaries and in 1920 only 6,830. He makes similar statements as to commissions of other crimes of serious nature. Even better results have been obtained in rural and small town districts."

The records of the San Francisco police department show a decrease in the total number of arrests in spite of the increase of population, and the officials express the belief that this decrease is due almost wholly, if not entirely, to the prohibition law.

The effect of prohibition in the last five years, showing how the dry laws have cut in half the number of arrests in Wilmington, Delaware, for all causes, and have reduced the arrests for drunkenness to one-seventh of the former number, is revealed in a report recently compiled by the prohibition director. Figures for the New Castle county workhouse show 44 per cent less prisoners.

BETTER CITIZENSHIP Less drunkenness, fewer crimes committed, uplift of family conditions—does this not naturally mean better citizenship? The Sioux City (Iowa) Journal says, "So far as The Journal has observed, there is an entire absence of open liquor drinking in Sioux City. The open temptation to drink that formerly caused young men to go wrong has been eliminated. To have removed that temptation from young men is a gain of vast importance and significance and is worth all the effort that prohibition has cost. It is that fact that stimulates hope of and confidence in the ultimate success of prohibition."

"The Enemy"

A Thrilling Serial Story To Begin Next Week

A tale with a thrill in every chapter! A series of dramatic episodes that grip you; a charming love story that delights you; an ocean voyage to the Orient that exhilarates you; an insight into life in faraway India that educates you; a swift succession of graphic pictures of the evils that result from the social custom of drinking—this characterization describes the serial story, "The Enemy" by Frances S. Hallowes, that is to begin in next week's paper. You will not want to miss a chapter.

American Education Week A Success Says the American Legion

Writing to the National W. C. T. U. of its appreciation of the co-operation of that organization in making American Education Week a success, the national director of the Americanism Commission of The American Legion says:

"I am pleased to direct your attention to the Summary of American Education Week—December 4th to 10th, 1921. You will note that your organization was most highly instrumental in making a success of the undertaking for the furthering of the best interests of education in the United States. You have the everlasting gratitude of The American Legion for the whole-hearted assistance you gave and we are looking to you for support in the future.

"Most cordially yours,
(Signed) Alvin M. Owsley,
National Director Americanism Commission."

THE WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION IN DISTINGUISHED COMPANY

Anna Adams Gordon

Some of the newspaper comments on the Law Observance Star window card, give the impression that the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union is standing alone in urging all citizens to work for the observance and enforcement of law. It is well to remind ourselves and our friends of the many distinguished champions of the principle represented by this "Law Observance Star."

In advocating this window star with its motto, "Serve America, Support the Constitution," we line up with Abraham Lincoln in his famous utterance:

"Let reverence for law be breathed by every American mother to the lisping babe that prattles on her lap; let it be taught in schools, in seminaries and colleges; let it be written in primers, spelling-books and in almanacs; let it be preached from the pulpits, proclaimed in legislative halls, and enforced in courts of justice; in short, let it become the political religion of the nation; and let the old and young, the rich and poor, and the grave and gay, of all sexes and tongues and colors and conditions, sacrifice unceasingly upon its altars."

We line up with Chief Justice Taft of the United States Supreme Court in his strong statement:

"It is the duty of loyal citizens to obey the laws and to insist upon their enforcement, no matter what they thought of the Amendment before its adoption."

We line up with United States Attorney General Daugherty, in his declaration before the American Bar Association at its Cincinnati Convention, August 31, 1921:

"Our safety and happiness lie in obedience to law by every man, woman and child within the domain of the republic, and no one can undermine respect for law without being, to that extent, an enemy to law and orderly government."

We line up with the American Bar Association in the warning presented at the Cincinnati meeting by the judicial section of that body:

"The people of the United States have undertaken to suppress the age-old evil of the liquor traffic. When for the gratification of their appetites, lawyers, bankers, merchants, and manufacturers and social leaders, both men and women, scoff at this law or any other law, they are aiding the cause of anarchy and promoting mob violence. They are sowing dragon's teeth and they need not be surprised when they find that no judicial or police authority can save our country or humanity from reaping the harvest."

American Legion Expresses Appreciation of Gift of National W. C. T. U.

The General Officers of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union have received from the National Executive Committee of The American Legion the following resolution of appreciation, beautifully engraved on handsome vellum paper, bearing the seal and the colors of the organization. The resolution reads:

RESOLUTION
Adopted by the National Executive Committee of THE AMERICAN LEGION in session November 2, 1921.

WHEREAS: the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union has generously offered the balance of its Patriotic Fund in the sum of $4,000.00 to The American Legion for the benefit of permanently disabled comrades; and

WHEREAS: this gift expresses, not money's worth alone, but sentiment and feeling which are beyond value;

BE IT HEREBY RESOLVED, That we accept this kindly tender with full appreciation of the spirit of the donors; and

BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED, That the gratitude of The American Legion be conveyed to them by this resolution duly inscribed and transmitted by the proper National Officers.

Why Not In Your Church Bulletin?

The following "gentle reminder" appeared in the weekly bulletin of the First Baptist Church of Evanston, Illinois:

"Lest you should feel that the Eighteenth Amendment has put an end to the need for temperance agitation, just observe the list of thirty organizations, some of them incorporated, that exist for the purpose of the overthrow of that amendment printed in the last issue of THE UNION SIGNAL, the organ of the W. C. T. U. As long as the enemies of law enforcement agitate, the friends thereof must not hold their peace."

Why not a similar reminder in the bulletin of your church?

Correction

Through a misunderstanding, the article in THE UNION SIGNAL for January 19, entitled, "Americanization—A Link in the Social Chain" was credited to the national director. We are told that this most interesting account was written, instead, by Miss Theo. Whiting, who has been doing Americanization work among the Mexican people.

Summary: Questionnaires were sent to 53,900 physicians, representing 37 per cent of the physicians of the United States, and 31,115 replies were received; 15,625, or 51 per cent, favored whisky; 15,218, or 49 per cent, were opposed to whisky; 22,663, or 74 per cent, replied to the beer question in the negative, and 7,934, or 26 per cent, voted for beer; 20,648, or 68 per cent, voted against wine, and 9,803, or 32 per cent, voted for wine.

The vote was affirmative for whisky in 20 states and negative in 29. In all the states the vote in regard to beer and wine was largely negative. Fifty-eight per cent of the vote in cities favored whisky. In the rural districts the vote against whisky was 54 per cent. On wine and beer both cities and country voted largely negative. The North Atlantic states and the South Atlantic states gave a majority vote favoring whisky.

There is no doubt that if this vote had been taken prior to the enactment of the national prohibition law with its restrictions upon physicians as to the prescription of liquors the result might have been different. More whisky has been prescribed in the past two years than in a long time previous. The difficulty of getting liquor for beverage use has led to great abuse of the medical prescription on the part of medical men who care more for the dollars gained, or the friends accommodated, than they care for their own honor or that of their profession. A very great deal of irritation has been felt and expressed that any set of lawmakers should dare to interfere with the medical profession as to what it should want to use in the treatment of disease. This irritation, no doubt, influenced a good many replies.

Of course this vote does not settle the value of alcohol as a medicinal agent. It only shows that a considerable number of the medical profession still cling to the old views of alcohol even in states where for some years they have not been permitted to prescribe it. It shows, too, the need of continued work in the department of Medical Temperance.

Later, some of the comments made by physicians on the lack of need of alcoholic liquors as medicines will be given, together with suggestions as to best methods of preventing the present widespread abuse of the physicians' permits.

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awak'ning continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

The Cleft Rock

Louisa L. Weightman

'Mid the tempests of life, through its pain and its woe,
No anguish need vanquish, no wave overflow,
For lo, through the ages, withstanding all shock,
There looms for our refuge, the "Cleft in the Rock."
O, measureless peace! where waves of unrest
Once lashed their wild billows unchecked o'er my breast.
O, Rock, cleft for all, to Thy shadow I flee.
Dear Jesus, my Refuge, I'm resting in Thee.

In the gathering shades, at the close of life's day,
No gloom need affright me, no darkness dismay.
For see in the distance, dispelling the dark,
What radiance streams from "The Cleft in the Rock."
O, Light of the World! Thou guidest our way
Through the doorway of death, to a glorious day.
O, Rock, cleft for all, to Thy shadow I flee.
Dear Jesus, my Refuge, I'm trusting in Thee.

RED LETTER DAYS

March 1—Union Signal Subscription Day. (Birthday of Lillian M. N. Stevens.)

Sunday School Work

Dear Sunday School Workers:—

The dates of the quarterly temperance lessons for 1922 are, March 12, April 23, July 16 and October 29. The date of Anti-Cigaret Day, (the second temperance Sunday of the year) comes only one month later than the date of the first lesson, making immediate preparatory work necessary for both temperance Sundays. The list of lessons with titles, temperance topics, etc., will soon be published in THE UNION SIGNAL and printed in leaflet form at 45 cents per 100. Anticipating this, the following is the outline for March 12:

The lesson topic is "Amos warns Israel" and the text of the lesson is Amos 6:1-8. The Golden Text is Proverbs 20:1. Topic for Primary Workers: "God sends Amos on an Errand." Memory verse, Amos 5:14. The lesson topic for Juniors is "A Prophet who was a Friend to the Poor" with the same memory verse. The temperance lesson suggested for these two departments of the children's division is "Warning voices against everything that will harm the body, God's temple." The Intermediate and Senior departments have as their topic, "The Consequences of Self-indulgence." The temperance lesson for these two departments, comprising the young people's division is, "Habits which destroy life and its prospects." A timely topic is given the adult classes, "Social Evils yet to be Conquered." The adult division is asked to study our prohibition law and its enforcement. Consult the catalogue of the National W. C. T. U. Most helpful leaflets will be found to aid in presenting all of these subjects. The following blackboard outline may be used as the basis of a temperance talk either in classes or before the school.

AMOS A Model for Modern REFORMER

The Sunday School literature prepared by Mrs. Stella B. Irvine and heretofore published for the benefit of the Sunday School department of the National W. C. T. U. has been presented by her to the national organization and will henceforth be republished and circulated with the regular departmental literature, by the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House at Evanston, Illinois. The change was contemplated by the national superintendent early last year and was the direct result of a careful survey of the Sunday School field which convinced her that all of her time would be needed, not only to maintain and intensify the present plans, but to develop the work in new and important avenues opening to the department. It is not probable that the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House will publish all of the material presented to it, but, a choice selection will be made. Every Sunday School worker should send to the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, Evanston, Illinois, for the new catalogue and order supplies for Sunday School work.

The lesson leaflet, formerly of four pages, will henceforth be a one page leaflet and convey to the workers the temperance lesson, and advices concerning the literature available as helps for the work in the Sunday School. New material will be prepared for the department and published as often as the needs require and workers are urged to send early for samples and prices.

Because of the change in handling the literature, the quarterly budget will be discontinued and in its place the national superintendent will establish and maintain a mailing and correspondence list of workers, who will receive the bulletin of the department, frequent communications giving instruction, up-to-date Sunday School information necessary to our work, points for publicity, and samples of literature suited to the needs. Sunday School workers and others desiring to be enrolled on the mailing list, should at once send to the national superintendent their names and addresses, enclosing fifty cents for postage. The present subscribers to the budget will be enrolled on the mailing list, unless otherwise instructed. The aim will be to make the new plan as effective in helping the work as the budget has always been. The bulletin will advertise literature, instruct workers and aid in our department extension work soon to be outlined.

Our present plan of Sunday School work will be continued and intensified. We remind our workers of our method of helping the million members campaign by setting our faces toward the goal of our department slogan: "Every Sunday School teacher and officer an active or honorary member of the W. C. T. U." REMEMBER—The national superintendent will send out the bulletin and only samples of literature. Send all orders for supplies to the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, Evanston, Illinois. We bespeak the helpfulness of all workers in making this change in our department effective, and note that it will take a little time to adjust matters.

We invite the co-operation of all white ribboners in our continued effort to make the Sunday School department a powerful factor in establishing the principles for which the W. C. T. U. stands.

Yours in loyal service,
Stella B. Irvine, National Superintendent
Sunday School Department,
115 Walnut St., Riverside, Calif.

Social Welfare Notes

Miss Rebecca N. Rhoads, National W. C. T. U. superintendent of the department of Soldiers and Sailors, recently spent a very pleasant but strenuous day in Virginia in the interests of the work. Escorted by Mrs. Amelia F. Colgan, bi-county superintendent of the department of Soldiers and Sailors, Miss Rhoads first went to the Y. M. C. A. at Fort Monroe, later addressing the Fellowship Club. In Newport News she spoke at the Soldiers' Rest. At Phoebus, in the Methodist Church, Miss Rhoads spoke to the members of the local W. C. T. U. and urged the establishment of a "tarry a while room," where the soldiers and sailors could meet while off duty. Mrs. Phillips, state superintendent, was among those present. Soldiers' Home Hospital was another point visited. Through the kindness of Dr. Truitt of the Methodist Church, Mr. Carrington and Mr. Earl, secretaries of the Fort Monroe Y. M. C. A., and others, cars were placed at Miss Rhoads' disposal to enable her to reach quickly the places visited.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

KEEP THE GOAL IN SIGHT!

Mrs. Maude B. Perkins, National Y. P. B. General Secretary

When Greece and Rome were rich in worldly goods, they allowed their manhood to decay. Corruption of youth bore fruit in the slow death of the nation. Shall America fall like the peoples of that by-gone day? Not while we make the training of our boys and girls our first aim. I believe the greatest conservative work that we can do is to build into the lives of the young men and women of today the principles embodied in the PURPOSE of the Young People's Branch.

"The purpose of the Young People's Branch is to unite the young people of the community, county and state in a campaign for the enforcement of the prohibitory law; to keep alive the civic consciousness concerning the value of total abstinence; to educate the young men and women as to the effect of tobacco upon the human system; to study the meaning of a single standard of purity, and live it; that we may emphasize the essentials of Christian Citizenship and thus perpetuate the heritage that has come to us from the mother organization."

Through the Young People's Branch the young folk of the community are united to carry on the teaching that has put the Eighteenth Amendment into the Constitution. This is not the work of any one denomination and each young people's society of the church has its own specific program. The program of the Young People's Branch is not a duplication of effort but is distinct in that it relates to the vital reforms of the day—reforms that will keep our nation from decay.

No matter how busy young people may be they cannot afford to leave out of their activities the training afforded by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Total abstinence truths must be made attractive. Through organized effort this can be done by the debates, and suggestions found in the Y. P. B. Year Book.

Citizenship is stressed by our study book, "Studies in Government." Programs for this study are also found in the Year Book.

Our directors and superintendents have given much thought to plans for the Young People's Branch. These, too, are found in the Year Book. You will be interested in the awards offered.

You have received the goal established for your state and which appeared in THE UNION SIGNAL of January 12. The year 1922 has just begun.

Now all together we will work to reach our goal!

Winning College Students For the Young People's Branch

Mrs. Alice M. Bigney, Y. P. B. secretary for the Maine W. C. T. U., has sent out an appeal to the Y. W. C. A. and Y. M. C. A. in every college and Normal school in her state. As might be expected from the "grand old state," all but one of these institutions have promised cooperation in the advancement of the plans offered for our work in schools and colleges. She writes, "I have received from one to four replies from each letter and shall follow up this response with definite plans for the temperance work in these higher institutions of learning."

Following is a copy of Mrs. Bigney's letter:

"In our plans to secure thorough enforcement of law the educational factor comes first. Especially do we wish to reach the young men and women of our colleges and Normal schools, for from their ranks must come our future community leaders. The study course of our Young People's Branch gives a thorough understanding of the temperance question, physical, social and economic,—and we hope that many of our students will take up this allied work.

"It seems almost useless to ask for the formation of a new society when your time is already so fully occupied, but this subject is too important to be overlooked. Will you not appoint a temperance committee for your Association, whose chief objective shall be temperance work? There are many ways in which such a committee can work. The students may be induced to take our study course, or to compete for the $100 prize offered for the best essay on a given subject; temperance reference books and THE UNION SIGNAL may be placed in the college library; speakers provided for chapel service; debates arranged, and other plans (outlined in the new Year Book) carried out. Your committee might carry on a pledge signing campaign, pledge signers to become, upon payment of dues, members at large of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Will you not as good citizens do your utmost to have a part or all of this work adopted?"

What is done in Maine may be done in every college in our country. Educators welcome the message and the students respond to the appeal. If these students in their days of preparation know of the work of the W. C. T. U., they will be ready and willing to take up the work in whatever community they may be called to serve.

Follow the plans outlined for work in schools and colleges found in the 1922 Year Book and let us make a record in this line of endeavor.

Wise Mr. Coolidge

(G. P., in a letter to the Springfield Republican.)

"A wise old owl lived in an oak,
The more he saw the less he spoke.
The less he spoke the more he heard,
Why can't we be like that old bird?"

The above stanza, which hangs over the open fireplace in Vice-President Coolidge's home in Northampton, Mass., may answer the question why our Vice-President has had the name of "Sphinx" given him. He evidently is remembering the wise old owl in Washington, as well as when in Boston.

A Student on the Jericho Road

By Ernest Fremont Tittle

A certain man left the farm and went to college. His best suit of clothes was the one on his back, but it was none too good, and it was, moreover, his only suit. He was full of ambition, but he had a great deal to learn, and he fell among snobs who stripped him of all his little conceit, and departed, leaving him more than half discouraged.

By chance a certain instructor met him one day, and noted his dejected appearance, but said to himself: "I cannot afford to waste my time on such unpromising material as he."

In like manner also, a fellow student, himself a Freshman, observed his classmate's downcast face, but reflected: "This is not the sort of chap that I want to tie up to."

But a certain upper-classman who was known on the campus as a "good fellow," when he saw the discouraged look in the eyes of the new man, stopped and said to him: "Look here, old fellow, you are having a pretty rotten time, aren't you? Better come around to my room to-night and talk it over."

Which of these three, think you, proved neighbor to him who fell among snobs?

Which of these three, think you, was able that night from the heart to pray, "Our Father"?

Try "Signal Steam" for the Trio-Team of your Y. P. B.! At least the president, secretary and treasurer of your Branch should have THE UNION SIGNAL.

Prohibition and Extracts

The W. C. T. U. encourages the manufacture of alcohol when they buy alcoholic extracts. We are told that many factories have sprung up since prohibition, for the manufacture of alcoholic extracts. Do you realize the misuse made of such extracts? Do you want to encourage the distribution of alcohol in this form to anyone who wants to buy it, without protesting? If you doubt the harm being done in this way, write us for authentic information. We believe you will see the good which you can do in your town by taking up the sale of EveryDay liquid, non-alcoholic flavorings.

In addition to this good influence, you can substantially add to your treasury. One Ohio woman has written us that in the year they have sold EveryDay Flavors, they have had more money in their treasury than they ever had before. Isn't that splendid endorsement?

Write for our liberal terms. We do not overload you with a big supply, nor burden your union with an obligation which is unfair to you. We work with you. Our cooperation is yours for the asking. An inquiry today will bring a prompt reply.

Scientific Temperance Instruction Activities

Elizabeth O. Middleton,
National Director

The increase in activity of this department in 1921 over 1920, as evidenced by reports sent in, is encouraging. More and more our workers are securing the co-operation of state, county and city school superintendents. This tends to make our work more systematic, more thorough. But having this co-operation by no means lessens our work. Rather it increases our responsibility. If we ask of educators that our suggested plans of work be followed in the schools, we must prepare ourselves to answer calls which will come to us with this increased activity.

In connection with the ten Regional Conferences held in the spring of 1921, eight S. T. I. conferences were held and proved an interesting feature of the Regional Conferences. Following the oral contests, written essays were submitted under the two classes, first, "Best Talk to Teachers," ten essays; second, "Best Talk to Children," seven essays. The prize in the first class was awarded to Mrs. Rosa M. Webb, Kansas City, Mo.; in the second class to Mrs. Lem Gilreath, Etowah, Tenn.

The following states were on the Roll of Honor for two or more counts, indicating that much good work has been done: Pennsylvania, New York, Illinois, Wisconsin, Missouri, New Jersey, Kentucky, Virginia, Kansas, Vermont, Colorado, Ohio, Washington (W.) Reports from other states did not quite come up to these requirements.

At the last session of the Connecticut legislature a strenuous effort was made to repeal the Temperance Education law. Through the work of the W. C. T. U. this law was retained. In Drury College, Springfield, Mo., two hundred essays were written. The national prize essay, eighth grade, was read at the state Teacher's Association in Oregon, having been won by a pupil in Portland. County prize essays were read at county fairs. In connection with the national Regional Conference the grade teachers of Portland gave a reception to the national S. T. I. director. Prize essays were read at Parent-Teacher meetings and at Sunday evening service in New Jersey; seventy-two Tinling booklets and flags were placed in schools. Kentucky has a special course of study in physiology and hygiene in forty universities, colleges, Normal and summer schools. Vermont places four hundred copies of the Young Crusader in schools. "A new impetus was given the S. T. I. work following the Regional Conference" in Colorado. Ninety-two teachers are members of the W. C. T. U. in Washington (West); the city superintendent of schools of Tacoma has essay subjects and rules announced in the Tacoma Tribune. Space forbids the mentioning of many more interesting points from other states.

State S. T. I. superintendents are enthusiastic over the work for the new year. The Board of Education of the City of Warren, Ohio, has given the state superintendent an order for sixty-four temperance books and four subscriptions for THE UNION SIGNAL. A county school superintendent in Missouri writes: "I expect to have every teacher in my county enter her school in the essay contest."

W. C. T. U. History in the Making

Alone we can do little. Separated, we are units of weakness; but aggregated we become batteries of power. We want all those like-minded with us, who would exalt the home, redeem manhood, and uplift womanhood, to join hands with us for organized work according to a plan.—Frances E. Willard.

W. C. T. U. Window Exhibit Good Advance Agent in Membership Campaign

A well arranged W. C. T. U. window exhibit will attract attention and arouse an interest in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union that will be of decided advantage in the membership campaign to follow. Secure space in some prominent and well situated store. Assemble the posters, literature, and other articles you desire to display; ask the advice and help of some local window trimmer. A good-sized globe (borrowed from the school) encircled with a beautiful white ribbon, may form the center-piece, and back and above it may be placed the Law Observance Star window card. On either side may appear the Lincoln and the "Guard Their Future" posters. The remainder of space may be filled with other illustrated W. C. T. U. posters, leaflets, copies of THE UNION SIGNAL and The Young Crusader and pictures of Frances E. Willard. A quantity of pledge cards, with pen and ink in close proximity, should be conspicuous in the foreground. A member of the W. C. T. U. may have a table in the store and invite women customers to join the W. C. T. U., and present to all who become members a Law Observance Star window card. A short article describing this W. C. T. U. window exhibit should appear in the local press, and special reference be made to the Law Observance Star window card, with an invitation to all citizens to display it in their windows.

How about March first? Don't fail to observe it by a rousing UNION SIGNAL meeting.

"Catch a Member" Campaign

1. Look very carefully over your field: he churches, the women's clubs, the D. A. R., the Y. W. C. A., the Business and Professional Women's Clubs, the Women's Relief Corps, all of the thirty women's organizations that are constituent members of the National Council of Women, which at its recent meeting went on record in favor of the enforcement of the national prohibition law.

2. Classify these women as to their special interests. Some will find our World's W. C. T. U. work absorbing. Others can be appealed to through the departments of Americanization, Women in Industry, Social Morality. All will take kindly to Child Welfare.

3. Conduct quietly a preliminary campaign of education. Send copies of THE UNION SIGNAL to prospective members, marking articles describing special branches of our work that will interest them.

4. Invite these "hoped for" members to go with you to a local union meeting.

5. If you do not succeed immediately in enlisting them as members, do some tactful "follow up" work by correspondence, or telephone conversation, evidencing your earnest desire to have them become members of the white ribbon family.

Newspaper Publicity An Aid To Membership Campaign

"Make friends with the newspapers of your town and get them interested in your membership campaign," advises an experienced worker. "They can, if they will, and they will if you present the matter in the right way, help you to inaugurate your campaign for members, and prepare the minds of the women of your community for the invitation you are to extend to them." The Georgia W. C. T. U. has had at its disposal for some time two or three columns each week in the Atlanta Constitution, a paper with a nation-wide reputation, in which to tell the reading public of white ribbon activities. Very recently this opportunity for helpful publicity has been enlarged by an offer of additional space each week in the magazine section of the daily Constitution. What our Georgia comrades are doing, other women can do in their own cities. Try to secure the editors as allies in the campaign for law enforcement and good government!

Who Doesn't Love a Baby?

Is there a woman, young or old, rich or poor, in your town, who does not love a baby? A Child Welfare poster contest, as described by the national director of Child Welfare, in the December 8 UNION SIGNAL, cannot fail to arrest the attention of all the child-loving women in your community. They are certain to talk about it and wish they could enter the contest and show what they know about taking care of little folks, and ten to one this will lead them to want to join the greatest Child Welfare organization in the world, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

She Changed Her Mind

A former president of a W. C. T. U. moved to another city to care for a dear one who needed attention. She had little time to give to outside work and had neglected renewing her subscription to her temperance paper. Meeting her pastor in a neighboring city, he said to her, "What do you think? Our friend, Mrs. Black, has heard so much about bootlegging that she thinks the Eighteenth Amendment cannot be enforced." "I told him I would look after her," said the white ribboner in repeating the story, "and I did so at once by sending her THE UNION SIGNAL. I met this same woman a short time after and her views on prohibition and enforcement of the law were completely changed."

Moral: Read THE UNION SIGNAL yourself and see that your friends read it also. "The truth shall make them free." —I. D. V.

Have You Tried "Signal Steam" to make your Membership Drive go? Get Your Trio Team to take the weekly UNION SIGNAL, and watch the results.

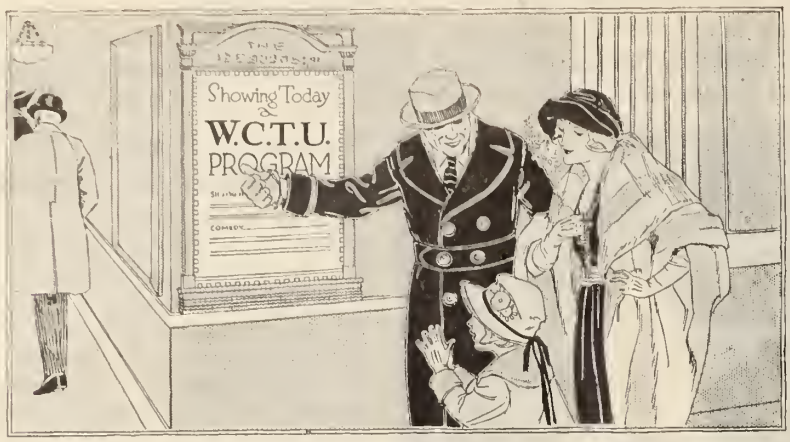
Let Your Enforcement Officials Know You Appreciate Their Efforts

Appreciation of what our law enforcement officials are doing should go hand in hand with our co-operation. A resolution similar to the one adopted by the Tucson (Arizona) W. C. T. U. at its January 16th meeting might well be placed on the records of every local union. It reads: "Resolved that we express to our law enforcement officials (federal, state, county and municipal) our keen appreciation of their efforts to bring violators to justice, and urge them to continue the same vigorously, assuring them that we are eager to support and assist them in every way possible to bring about law enforcement.

"We hereby express to the local press appreciation for their generous publicity, and make the urgent request that they desist from publishing wet propaganda."

"They Will Be Sure to Ask Questions"

"I want one of the Law Observance Stars in the window of my school room," said the teacher. "It will no doubt cause the children to ask questions, and in answering I can urge upon them reverence for and observance of all laws and every time they look at the star they will be reminded of my words."



Our Fight Is Still On!

Show the motion picture "SAFEGUARDING THE NATION" to prove that our work is not done.

This is not a popular story, but an interesting presentation of scientific laboratory experiments showing the effects of alcohol upon the body.

Create public sentiment for the enforcement of the 18th Amendment by letting facts talk for themselves across the screen.

"SAFEGUARDING THE NATION" with a bright comedy makes a good program for schools, churches, and temperance societies.

Dr. Clarence True Wilson says, "The picture gives evidence of greatest fidelity to detail and its production is irrespective of expense."

commissioner of correction, says that in spite of unemployment, increase of population, and after-war conditions, the entire penal population of Massachusetts shows a decrease of 3,625 from September, 1914, when it was 6,877; in September, 1921, 3,253. This is an increase over the figures of 1919 and 1920 and yet it is still over 50 per cent less than under the old license system." (Jones.)

It will be noted here that Mr. Bates is careful to compare the figures for 1921, which are larger than those of 1919 and 1920, with the preceding wet years. False reports about the effects of prohibition increasing crime have been made out by comparing only the year 1921 with 1920. The slight increase thus found in some places, due no doubt to the temporary advantage gained by the illicit traffic while the machinery of enforcement has been getting under way, amounts to very little, as Mr. Bates points out, when compared to the pre-prohibition figures.

The decrease which prohibition has brought about in juvenile crime and delinquency is even more significant and encouraging than its effect on the criminality of adults.

Moral character is so largely a matter of home training that it is not necessary to prove the relation between homes demoralized by drink and juvenile delinquency. Here, at the bottom of the ladder of crime, is shown the preventive working of prohibition.

Arrests for exposing children to vice and crime decreased from 33 cases in 1915 to none in 1919, wrote the judge of the Juvenile Court in Richmond, Virginia, where state prohibition went into effect in 1916. Judge Frank Lahr, of the Juvenile Court of Indianapolis, says that in the last wet year in Indiana, 619 cases of parents brought before him for delinquency in the care of their children were the result of booze. The first dry year he had only 5 such cases, and the next year 7. After the state prohibition law went into effect, 90 of the 619 families purchased property and practically all provide for their families far better than in wet years.

"Less domestic discord; fewer boys in pool-rooms; fewer parents before the courts," wrote a New Orleans correspondent to the Christian Science Monitor, and the head of a firm of real estate brokers in Louisville summed up his opinion of the results of prohibition in that city thus:

they amounted to 104,366. In 1920 they had dropped to 51,863, a decrease of over 50 per cent.

In Peoria, Illinois, arrests for all causes fell off the first dry year over 50 per cent. (M. E. Board of Temperance.) In Pittsburgh the jail commitments the first dry year were only 4,721, a decrease of 67.8 per cent from the last wet year, when they were 14,684 (according to the warden, Edwin Lewis, cited by Senator Jones in his speech on the Anti-Beer bill).

In Cincinnati the total of all criminal offenses was 48.8 per cent less in 1920 than in 1918.

The number of commitments to prison in New York state, according to a report of the state commissioner of prisons for 1920, fell from 129,352 in 1917 to 59,033 in 1920, a decrease of 54 per cent.

The Friend

Agnes E. Volentine

As Judge Barter entered the office, Anthony Kent, Federal Prohibition Director, looked up from the personal letter he had just finished reading.

"Your 'friend'—" he repeated, musingly. "Barter, did you ever think what it means to be a real friend?"

"Why, I suppose I have," the Judge answered warily—"but I didn't imagine you were that hard up. How much cash do you want?" He gave an unjudgelike grin.

"Aw! You know that isn't what I meant," the other protested with equal boyishness. "This letter is from Randolph Mains," he went on seriously, "the best friend I ever had—even better, begging your pardon, than you ever had the chance to be. You didn't know him, of course; that was in the old days when —Barter, I've never told you," he impulsively interrupted himself, "but I used to—drink."

"You!"

"That's one reason I fight the stuff so hard now. I'm going to see that it stays put out, and that the law is enforced if I have to break the brewers' big horses' ham-strings to do it! That's my prohibition ticket. But about Randolph," subduing the fire in his tones, "he was one of a half-dozen young men whom I called friends in my early manhood. They were all total abstainers, and I had always been till I got to overworking and a cousin, with whom I boarded, persuaded me to drink a little with him, to tone up, as he said.

"Soon I got to liking liquor entirely too well, and began visiting saloons and staying out late at nights. Then several times I got drunk; and, as I found out afterward, I made a fool of myself more than once on social occasions. Of course I thought at the time I was just being unusually brilliant." He smiled grimly. "If I had known, the humiliation of it would have made me stop short. But nobody told me—they were all too good friends."

"Ah, I see!" nodded the judge.

"That is, all except Randolph. After I had made a spectacle of myself the second time, he could stand it no longer, as he told me later. And he decided he was going to enlighten me though it cost him my friendship, which, strangely, he valued highly. Then he thought out a plan and I soon gave him the opportunity to use it. The next time I began carrying on at a social gathering, Randolph whipped out his note-book and pencil—he was a stenographer—and without anyone's knowing what he was doing, he wrote down what I said, word for word. Then, when he had transcribed his notes, he sent them to me by mail, with the briefest possible explanation.

"When I had seen what I had said—the maudlin sentiments, the business secrets I had no right to divulge, the public revelations of private things that I would have hesitated to tell the most intimate friend,—I turned sick with shame. I felt as if I could never again face those people. I experienced, too, a terrible anger at the thing—the liquor traffic—that had been the cause of my undoing. And I was sensitive and self-respecting enough for that revelation to cure me of drinking—the habit, you see, had not obtained a very strong hold on me as yet. And I've not only stayed dry myself, I've worked against the curse ever since."

"No wonder the liquor folks call you Mad Anthony," smiled the Judge.

"There's a reason," replied Kent. He opened a lower drawer of his desk and took out an old letter. It was addressed in the same handwriting as that of the letter open before him.

"Barter, I keep those transcribed notes, and shall always. No, I don't want you to read them—I never do myself. But I look at the envelope sometimes; it reminds me of things that fire my fighting blood to renewed heat, while if I get to feeling too big, the sight of it humbles me down a bit. And Randolph's letter today brought it all back still more plainly."

"So his showing you the truth didn't break up your friendship?"

"Just the opposite. I have never ceased to thank God for a friend who had the courage to be a friend when I needed one. The others professed to care for me, but they let me go on to ruin. Was that real friendship? But a friend —"

"I see," said the Judge thoughtfully.

Two Conversations, Overheard One Sunday Morning

"Good morning, Mrs. A. It is about a year since you joined the W. C. T. U. Of course you will wish to continue your membership. May I report your name, and hand in your dues at our meeting this week?"

"Thank you, Mrs. X., but I think I will not re-enlist for another year. I joined to help out your membership campaign, but as you know, I have been unable to attend the meetings, so I would like to drop out. Yes, I am sure the cause is a worthy one, but it does not seem to be particularly up-to-date. Goodbye."

"How do you do, Mrs. B. I am on the committee to report renewed memberships in the W. C. T. U., and I should like to be able to give your name this week."

"Thank you, Mrs. X. Yes, I like to feel that I belong. I am sorry I have not been able to attend the meetings very frequently this year, but I will come when I can. I have enjoyed THE UNION SIGNAL each week this year, and it has told me so much about the work that I want to have at least a little share in it. You may have my dues, and a renewal of my subscription also."

LET us persevere in our affectionate vigilance over that precious depository of American happiness, the Constitution of the United States. Let us cherish it, too, for the sake of those who, from every clime, are daily seeking a dwelling in our land.

REMEMBER that he who violates the laws of the land tramples on the blood of the fathers, and tears in sunder the charter of his own and his children's liberties.

OWNERS CANNOT WITHDRAW LIQUORS FROM BONDED WAREHOUSES—SENATE RESOLUTION SHOWS PROHIBITION IN ICELAND ENDANGERED—SECRETARY MELLON DISAPPROVES TAX ON WINE AND BEER—SENATOR KENYON NOW JUSTICE KENYON

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

Washington in Grief Over Terrible Disaster

Since last Saturday night, when the Knickerbocker Theater disaster occurred, Washington has been in mourning—a city benumbed and anguished by the heart-breaking tragedy. It reached into every home, from the White House to the dwellings of the lowly.

The Knickerbocker Theater was one of the most popular in the city, frequented by diplomats, members of Congress and officials generally since the peculiarly shaped edifice was erected.

Resolutions have been introduced in both houses of Congress looking to a thorough investigation. This sad occurrence should not fail to insure the safety of the movie theaters in the future.

Owners Cannot Withdraw Liquors From Bonded Warehouses, United States Supreme Court Declares

In a decision delivered by Justice McKenna, the Supreme Court held that intoxicating liquors stored in government bonded warehouses cannot be withdrawn by the owners for their personal use. The decision was dissented to by Justice McReynolds.

Such liquor can only be transported from the bonded warehouses, Justice McKenna stated, "to a wholesale druggist for sale to him for purposes not prohibited."

The Court, in a previous decision, had held that owners could withdraw from private warehouses liquor for their own consumption or for use of their families or their bona fide guests. The later ruling marks a wide distinction between private and bonded warehouses.

On this point Justice McKenna said that "mere ownership was not the equivalent" to possession and declared that under the Volstead law, "there must be ownership, and possession in one's private dwelling, and that character cannot be assigned to the bonded warehouses of the government."

The cases before the Court did not, he declared, have the effect of depriving those who held warehouse certificates of their property without due process of law, nor did it amount to the taking of private property for public purposes without just compensation.

Senate Resolution Shows Prohibition in Iceland Endangered

A resolution has been introduced by Senator Jones of Washington expressing the regret and great concern of the United States because Iceland, which has prohibition, is threatened with discrimination with respect to her fish exports by Spain on the ground that wines of that country are denied admission to Iceland.

The resolution in part follows:

"Resolved, that the Senate of the United States has heard with profound regret and great concern of such threatened pressure upon smaller nations to change their internal policies, and expresses the sincere hope that to promote international comity and good will among the nations and in recognition of the right of small nations to self-determination such pressure may not be resorted to against weaker countries, and all such efforts to force the liquor traffic upon the peoples like those of Norway, Finland, and Iceland and the opium traffic upon China may be abandoned by Christian and civilized powers, and that if such a policy is adhered to the United States should consider what proper means may be used to vindicate its domestic policy and secure the recognition of those principles of self-determination and the rights of small nations that should be fully recognized by all Christian and civilized peoples."

Secretary Mellon Disapproves Raising Bonus Revenue by Tax on Wine And Beer

Secretary Mellon appeared before the Ways and Means Committee and declared that, if the soldier bonus was to be raised, it must be raised by special tax, such as increased first and second class postage and tobacco levies. Mr. Mellon says that it would be impracticable to provide bonus revenue by a tax on wine and beer.

House Passes Independent Offices Appropriation Bill

The Independent Offices Appropriation Bill, carrying a total of $494,304,238, most of which is for use by the Veterans' Bureau, has been passed by the House and sent to the Senate. For the Bureau the bill appropriated $177,474,622, and the only change in this feature was the elimination of a provision which would have limited the number of camps at which training schools might be established to Camp Sherman, Ohio.

Of the amount appropriated in this bill more than $450,000,000 is to be spent during the coming year to pay compensation to disabled veterans and insurance on the lives of those who were victims of the war. In pre-war days this amount represented half of that spent for the entire government budget.

With the agitation for a soldier bonus for those who are physically uninjured by the war comes a realization of the enormous cost of aiding those who are disabled.

Commissioner Haynes Appoints Woman

The appointment of Miss Georgia Hopley of Bucyrus, Ohio, as the first woman general prohibition agent to be attached to the mobile forces of the headquarters unit, has been announced by Prohibition Commissioner Haynes. Miss Hopley is a former Ohio newspaper woman.

Woman's Traffic Corps Policing School Approaches

A woman's traffic squad has been organized in Washington to be stationed at busy street intersections near schools to safeguard the lives of children. Mrs. Ellis Logan, who is at the head of the newly organized auxiliary, reports that the majority of the more than one hundred women selected to assist have appeared at their posts. The program calls for a member to work one day in nine. The women will be on duty while students are going into the buildings and will also act during recesses and at the close of school. Each is equipped with a white arm band to distinguish her. Members have been given printed forms on which to note the number of the tag on all defying automobiles. These notations will be sent to the Corporation Counsel's Office where warrants will be sworn out.

Mrs. Logan said that children are beginning to understand the purposes of the new traffic squad, and are now waiting until they are given the sign to go across the street. "Any woman who wants to donate her time—we don't ask for money—will be willingly received," she said. "Even if she can only serve for half an hour, she can be used to good advantage. We could use several hundred more members without having any difficulty in locating corners where they can direct traffic."

Senator Kenyon Now Justice Kenyon

Senator Kenyon of Iowa, chairman of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, has been appointed by President Harding Circuit Judge for the Eighth District. The United States Circuit Court is second in rank only to the Supreme Court of the United States.

In the retirement of Senator Kenyon the Senate loses one of its ablest and finest men. He was Senate sponsor for the Webb-Kenyon Act and was always to be counted on when prohibition legislation was at stake. The Senator held the leadership of the farm "bloc" and great regret at his retirement is expressed by the agricultural interests of the country.

Aside from divergent views at times regarding legislation, he and President Harding have always been close friends.

Senator Kenyon has made the following statement:

"The President has known since our service together in the Senate that political life did not appeal to me and that my ambition was to serve on the Federal bench. When a vacancy occurred last fall in the Federal district judgeship in my state, some of my friends suggested my name to him and he indicated his willingness to appoint me. The legislative situation was such then that it seemed to me I could not accept.

"The situation is somewhat different now, as the West Virginia investigation is out of the way; likewise the Newberry case, and a large portion of the agricultural program has been put through.

"The question is presented to me again as to the circuit judgeship in the eighth judicial circuit, and the President, knowing my ambition and desire for service on the Federal bench, and, at the solicitation of some of my friends, has tendered me the appointment of Circuit Judge for that circuit, which I am pleased to accept."

New Ambassador To Belgium

It is expected that Henry P. Fletcher, Undersecretary of State, who has been named for ambassador to Belgium, will leave soon after the adjournment of the Conference on Limitation of Armament, for Brussels, the Belgium capital. He will succeed Brand Whitlock.

Mr. Fletcher began his diplomatic service as second secretary of the American Legation in Cuba in 1902. Since then he has served at Peking, Lisbon and Santiago, Chile. On October 1, 1910, when the legation at Santiago was made an embassy, Mr. Fletcher became America's first ambassador to Chile, which position he held until he was appointed ambassador to Mexico on February 25, 1916. He was sworn in March 6, 1921, as Undersecretary of State, succeeding Herman H. Davis.

A report of Conference on Limitation of Armament will be given next week.

Summary of Results of Two Years of National Prohibition

Federal Prohibition Commissioner Haynes names the twelve results of the prohibition law.

1. Disappearance of the open saloon.
2. Abatement of open drinking in public dining rooms.
3. Passing of the treating evil, which was recognized as the greatest contributing agency in the development of a liquor appetite.
4. Closing of whisky cures and similar institutions.
5. Increased savings accounts.
6. Record breaking Christmas business.
7. Decreased drunkenness.
8. Prohibitive price of "bonded" liquor for beverage use.
9. Dangerous character of illicit whisky.
10. Surreptitiousness of present-day drinking.
11. Wail of howling minority, who would go to the length of undermining the Constitution in order to nullify an amendment which their own action demonstrates is in actual effect.
12. Changed attitude of former hostile statesmen, political leaders and the press.

Why Prohibition Will Grow Continually Easier of Accomplishment

Federal Prohibition Commissioner Haynes gives these reasons:

1. Helpful attitude of the patriotic press, which recognizes the danger of lax enforcement to constitutional government and which stands four-square for enforcement of all laws.
2. Aroused citizenship.
3. Closer co-operation on the part of all enforcement agencies, headed by the United States Attorney General.
4. Poisonous, death dealing character of practically all illicit liquor now on the market.
5. Attitude of Canadian and other foreign officials against border smuggling.
6. More stringent state legislation.
7. Maximum penalty by courts.
8. Less leniency on the part of juries.
9. Weeding out of enforcement officials not in sympathy with enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment.
10. Attitude of physicians and druggists against prescription abuses.
11. Action of judicial section of the American Bar Association.
12. Curtailing of sources of supply.

Mexican Border to be Dry

A "bone dry" zone, extending over an area of forty miles inland along the full length of the California-Mexico border, soon will be proclaimed by the Mexican government, according to a statement just issued at Mexicali by Jose Lugo, new governor of the northern district of Lower California, and published in the daily press. Tia Juana, Mexicali, and Tecate will be among the towns to be made dry by the new order.

India Progressing Toward Prohibition Goal

India is still steadily progressing toward prohibition. Mr. William E. ("Pussyfoot") Johnson, who has returned from his trip to that country in the interest of world prohibition, says that the states of Limbri, Paranpur, and Bhavanagar, independent states in Bombay presidency, have all closed up their liquor shops, and Limbri has also closed its distillery. Baroda state is also planning for the adoption of the prohibition program. This is one of the most progressive independent states in India. It has a population of more than 2,000,000 people, a system of free and compulsory education, and a legislative assembly of its own.

What a University Man Says of Prohibition

Dr. Charles M. Dabney, until a year ago president of the University of Cincinnati, speaking in the press of the progressive way in which prohibition is working in that city, one of the wettest of the wet in pre-prohibition days, says:

"Since the saloons have been eliminated here, conditions are improving rapidly. There is less crime, as shown by the police, the court, and the workhouse reports, and much better health, as shown by the hospital records. The people for the most part are adapting themselves to prohibition with excellent spirit. The only complaints are from the old, habitual drinkers and those commercially interested in the liquor industry. Business is better, more money is going into the savings banks and into the homes, and the women and children are happier."

Mexico's Health Campaign

For some time Mexico's minister of the interior, General Calles, who is an ardent prohibitionist, has been working for a dry country. He has had various difficulties to overcome, but instead of ceasing the attack he has simply directed it from a different quarter. His latest endeavor has been to bring about prohibition because of its effect upon health. To do this he must convince the health department and the president of Mexico, under whose direct control is the health department, that the future physical welfare of the country depends upon getting rid of the liquor traffic. Thus the prohibition campaign becomes a health campaign, and the fact that President Obregon has more than once declared in favor of prohibition would seem to portend a successful result.

Mayor's Opposition to Volstead Act Fails of Support

It is not so long ago that Frank X. Schwab, now mayor of Buffalo, N. Y., announced with a great hooray and flourish of trumpets that if elected he would introduce into the city council a resolution calling on Congress to amend the prohibition law to permit the sale of "wholesome light wines and beer." When, however, in pursuance of his pre-election promise, he introduced such a resolution, it failed to obtain the endorsement of the council. "The legislators know the sentiment of the people and I don't believe it is for us to advise them," one of the councilmen, though an opponent of prohibition, is said to have declared.

Denver and Other Cities Turn Down Wine and Beer Proposition

Recently the Chicago city council passed a resolution urging the modification of the Volstead prohibition act, to permit the sale of light wine and beer, and sent a copy of the resolution to other councils, urging similar procedure. If the action of the Denver city council be taken as a criterion, however, sentiment in favor of modification is not marked. By a majority of six to three the council placed itself on record as opposing any changes in either Federal or state prohibition laws. Prior to the vote on the measure, resolutions advocating the defeat of the modification resolution were presented to the council by churches and temperance organizations.

Among other city councils which have also refused to pass such a resolution is that of Peoria, Illinois, formerly termed "the wettest city in the United States," because of its many distilleries, and that of Lansing, Michigan, where the majority was thirteen to one against the proposition. The city council of Detroit, Michigan, has declined to take action on the matter, the president stating that he did not think it necessary, and that he would not favor this step.

A DAY IN A W. C. T. U. CENTER

Culla J. Vayhinger, National Director of Americanization

The clock in front of the jewelry store, owned by Mr. Cerevegna, marked eight o'clock as a young woman, probably thirty years old, stepped lightly down Paulina Street, stopped in front of a store building facing on two streets, unlocked the door and went in. The windows were clean and in them was a fine exhibit of picture posters on health, prohibition, total abstinence, law enforcement, peace, good citizenship and child welfare, with the American flag much in evidence. Pictures of Washington, Lincoln, Lafayette, Kosciusko, Frances Willard, and in the center of the group a copy of Hoffmann's head of Christ, occupied a conspicuous position. On a window facing each street, in gold and black letters were the words, "W. C. T. U. Neighbors," and on the door in the same colors, the words, "Welcome. Walk in."

As she entered the bright cheery room the telephone rang and a voice at the other end of the line asked if a group of young Italian men and women from homes where the families were crowded into two rooms, might come to the Center the next evening with their own "eats" and have a party. The tone in which the request was made and permission given indicated that this was no unusual request, and the teacher in the happiest possible manner replied that she would be there and enjoy the occasion with them.

As she turned from the phone, the door opened and a dirty, unkempt woman entered. In broken English, she told a sorry tale of sickness in the city hospital, dismissal, inability to work, and no place to stay. The teacher heard her story and then called up the Salvation Army to see if they could take care of the case in their woman's quarters. Receiving a favorable reply, she wrote a note to the person in charge, asking her to let her know when the bearer arrived, placed it in the hands of her visitor, took her to the street car, paid her fare, and asked the conductor to put her off at the right place. Later, she was told over the phone that the woman had put in an appearance, all safe and sound.

It was nine o'clock when three women, wearing the marks of Russia as their native land, called at the Center. For one hour the teacher with infinite patience and care used her brain and all the ingenuity she could muster to instruct them regarding the various parts of the body. Then she took into her own hand the horny hand of each woman, cramped into the shape of the back of a scrubbing brush, and carefully guided the stubby fingers in the attempt to make letters that would spell her name. When the lessons were finished and the stories of sick babies, husbands out of jobs and the troubles of the children in school had been listened to with sympathetic attention, the teacher gave her promise to see what could be done, and the three foreign sisters, filled with more courage and interest because one American woman cared, went out to take up the trials and struggles incident to life in a strange land. The teacher sat down to her desk to make up her report of the last month's work which she must have ready by the next afternoon. She was to lunch at twelve-fifteen with the community nurse at the restaurant four blocks north of the Center and kept by the husband of one of her Greek pupils. She must get there before the nurse arrived that she might find out if he had secured the last bit of information necessary to properly make his declaration for citizenship. He had forgotten the name of the steamer on which he had come across and she had written several letters to other Greeks, who had been passengers on the same boat, trying to secure the desired facts. She was to discuss with the community nurse the needs of a family where help had been given the wife in confinement and the teacher had furnished the layette for the unwelcome, destitute little stranger.

Before she left the Center, she had made note of a W. C. T. U. meeting at which she was to present the needs of the Center; a meeting of the supervisors of Centers and Settlement Houses for the discussion of the need of a clearing house for organizations engaged in social service; had promised to call to see the husband of one of her pupils who wished to prepare for citizenship but worked at night and so could not attend the class taught by the Y. M. C. A.; had promised to go with Mrs. Felgitano to take her little girl to the free clinic for treatment of her eye which it was feared she was going to lose; had talked to the county agent about help for the Seike family until Mr. Seike recovered from the injury to his back caused by a fall from the building on which he was working.

The hour passed quickly and pleasantly because both young women were devoted to the work to which they felt the Master had called them.

The first caller after lunch was a most interesting one—Mrs. Marolich, to whom the worker had a few weeks previously given a reading lesson from Henry Ford's "Little White Slaver," that she might know why she should teach her boys not to smoke. Mrs. Marolich was returning the book as she had promised to do, but when she told the teacher that her husband had read it and "he smoke no more," the teacher decided to let her keep it that she might pass it on to some of her friends.

Mrs. Mastro came next for her lesson and showed much amusement as she told the teacher of some friends of hers who did not like this country and had returned to Italy last July because they could not get wine as they used to do, but had returned the evening before saying: "Italy no good—no wine—no chicken—no meat, only a little potato, no coffee."

These are some of the little things that encourage the heart of the W. C. T. U. Americanization worker.

At two o'clock, three white ribboners came and for an hour they studied with the teacher the correspondence course in Americanization, then went out with her to call at some of the homes of the neighborhood, in preparation for volunteer work among the mothers.

At three-thirty a crowd of boys and girls came scuffling into the Center, and after discouraged looking stockings had been pulled up off of shoe-tops, buttons put into their proper holes (or pins stuck where buttons should have been) and noses wiped, at the suggestion of the young women from the Y. P. B. who had charge of the Loyal Temperance Legion an interesting group of children representing Roumania, Greece, Italy, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Croatia and Russia were taught the reason why they should love America and the principles of the W. C. T. U.

This did not happen to be the time when the Mothers' Club or the Girls' Club met, or when the teacher was to visit the court, or the school, or when there was an evening class or the Mothers' Party, so the teacher went to her modest room with the feeling,

"I stand at my task and wait,
'Spite fatigue and delay and my sorrow,
For I feel in my face the breath of the dawn
Of a day that comes after tomorrow."

Kansas' Way of Americanizing Brings Results

During her recent visit to Kansas City (Kansas), Miss Amy Spalding, National W. C. T. U. Americanization worker, addressed the Council of Clubs and was enthusiastically received. "She helped me to see the foreign mother in a new light," was the opinion expressed by her hearers. Miss Spalding conducted an Americanization institute, using one of the W. C. T. U. members as a "model" in demonstrating her method. As a result, eight volunteer Americanization workers were secured. Professor I. B. Morgan, director of the night schools, was delighted with Miss Spalding's work and declared that the Woman's Christian Temperance Union has struck the keynote in Americanization by going into the homes to reach the mothers.

Rev. and Mrs. Joseph Zelechowski, "star pupils" of Mrs. Sena Hartzell Wallace, Kansas' superintendent of Americanization, participated in the institute program, playing two violin duets—first the national air of their own country, and then "The Star Spangled Banner." Mr. Zelechowski is in charge of the Ukrainian Greek Orthodox church. Each week he and his wife, natives of Ukraine, take lessons in English from Mrs. Wallace, and then teach members of their twenty-five parish families what they have just learned. Mr. Zelechowski has decided to become an American citizen, and Mrs. Wallace will assist him in preparing for his entrance examination.

Leaves From My Note Book

Theo. Whiting (Pacific Slope Worker)

In the west the W. C. T. U. has an opportunity to lead out in Americanization work. Other organizations are also interested in serving along this line but have no definite plans. So again and again, we have called together for conference all societies wishing to undertake work for foreigners, especially foreign women. Together we form an Americanization board, unite our efforts in work which has common interest for all, and do separately that which has a special appeal for us. In each state and town the problems differ but everywhere there is the Americanization of native Americans awaiting us.

The following organizations have cooperated with the W. C. T. U. in installing night school and home teachers, in conducting classes for foreign women, in doing organized neighboring in the homes, in training the foreign women for citizenship, in inviting the husband and wife to patriotic programs: The Protestant

SOME OF THE THINGS OUR STATE SUPERINTENDENTS OF CHILD WELFARE AND OUR LOCAL UNIONS ARE DOING

Just From Our Mail Bag

Elizabeth A. Perkins, National Director Department of Child Welfare

Maine's state superintendent, Mrs. Annie M. Barnes, is on a ten days' speaking trip in the interest of her department. She writes, "Fine services, great interest." Mrs. Barnes has worked out and proven in her own town the plan of Child Study groups. The town is organized by streets into groups of young mothers (twenty in a group), who meet at the homes of members, weekly or fortnightly, to study child problems; fathers' night and big meetings where all the groups come together are special features of the plan. (This plan will prove a MEMBER-WINNER, wherever tried). February time is fair time in Florida. Child Welfare exhibits will be displayed in at least three Florida fairs this month. Dr. Grace R. Parker, state superintendent, is pushing exhibits and every other department plan. Hot school lunches will be served in the little town of Ida, Michigan. To help with the necessary equipment the W. C. T. U. will furnish wash basins and paper towels for the children's use. Wisconsin's superintendent writes, "Am having many more calls for Child Welfare literature this year than last." North Dakota's Child Welfare exhibit is "on the road most of the time." Just before Christmas the state superintendent, Mrs. Kate S. Wilder, sent out an appeal for gifts for crippled children, and "boxes and boxes and boxes came from unions all over the state. There were more things than could be used at the hospital for crippled children so large boxes were sent to the Glad Tidings Mission, one to the Crittenton Home, one to the Day Nursery, and a number of scrap books to the children detained in the city detention hospital, ill with contagious diseases." Generous North Dakota Unions, and big hearted state superintendent, who also is health commissioner in Fargo. West Virginia's state superintendent, Mrs. V. E. Mohler, has added to her exhibit a beautiful set of posters, on "Foods and Health" for children. The Mother-Child Center in Toledo, Ohio, had a beautiful opening in January; you will hear more about it. District of Columbia (No. 2) unions, with assistance from Mother National, have established a Mother-Child Center. This Center will prove the great faithfulness and consecration of the women in Union No. 2. Unions in Monroe county, Michigan, have sent six layettes and two mothers' comfort kits to the national director; one layette and one mothers' comfort kit have been sent as a three months' loan to the Mother-Child Center in Washington. The mail bag is filled with letters asking for the "two monthly papers." "I have just been appointed superintendent of Mothers' Meetings and want to start right away" is the constant appeal. From Republic, Missouri—"We used the papers in our union and also at a meeting of the parent-teachers' association." Lavonia, Georgia—"Send papers to use in my school and for my mothers' meetings." Kalamazoo, Michigan—"Have the primary department in Sunday School, with an enrollment of fifty-one, and am starting a mothers' day once a month." Ransom, Kansas—"We shall start our mothers' meetings at once and make them very interesting for all young mothers." Mrs. E. V. Berg, Idaho (South) state superintendent, writes, "We have used every one of the monthly papers; don't know how we could have gotten along without them." Mrs. E. S. Hankinson, Weymouth North, Nova Scotia, superintendent of Mothers' Meetings, sends for the monthly papers and other Child Welfare material; Mrs. Hankinson was formerly an American teacher.

Mrs. Alice Methven, state president of Washington (East) W. C. T. U., is on a three weeks' speaking trip, and is carrying with her a Child Welfare exhibit. Michigan's state superintendent, Mrs. Mildred Hubbell, has mounted a miniature mother's comfort kit as a part of her exhibit. (Splendid plan for other state superintendents.) Minnesota is raising money with which (with help from the National) to establish a Mother-Child Center. We know Minnesota will soon be ready. Oregon's state superintendent, Mrs. Lottie Hannon, with the aid of the local unions, is making a great effort to have the University of Oregon furnish a correspondence course in "Scientific Motherhood." Success to Oregon women! North Branch, Michigan, W. C. T. U.'s have started a child study class; one hundred present at first meeting. They write, "IT PAYS TO ADVERTISE: Thanks for the posters." Mrs. Dessa Kelsheimer's Sunday School class of girls at Paxton, Illinois, sent a large box of hand-made dolls, picture-books and post-cards, to the national director for the Mother-Child Centers. Wasn't that fine! New York's state superintendent, Mrs. Edith F. Lee, is kept busy speaking on Child Welfare, and sending out her exhibit. Tennessee has just added to her exhibit a set of fifty-eight charts dealing largely with school health. The Reno, Nevada, W. C. T. U. has purchased a scale for the schools. Mrs. Flora Diefenderfer, Pennsylvania's state superintendent, is constantly adding to her large exhibit, and has many calls. Massachusetts' state superintendent, Mrs. M. Ella Ricker, has a Mary Gay theater as a part of her department equipment. She has a large collection of posters, many of them hand-made and suitcase size. (Practical plan). The hand-made posters are wonderfully attractive. One shows heads and figures of ten babies, nine happy, smiling and joyous, the tenth, only, (sad and sickly looking) representing the one in ten who will not live. Another poster done in crayon colors and mounted on "child welfare baby blue" gingham represents infant and maternity mortality; another shows the "school index number of states." (We want Mrs. Ricker to bring her suitcase posters to our next national convention.) Scores of letters in our January mail bag ask for instruction on Poster Contests, the Big Sister to the Expectant Mother plan, and on the Story Hour. California (South) state superintendent, Mrs. A. H. Gregg, has sent out an attractive mimeo sheet, on "Outline of what to do; something for every community" and closes with the words. "MAKE THE CHILD WELFARE DEPARTMENT A MEMBER-WINNER FOR YOUR UNION."

Watch for the next Mail Bag.

A Prayer for a Sleeping Child

Once a wife in Bethlehem
Had a child like me;
Once she watched a sleepy head
Held upon her knee,
And, with young eyes dim,
Low she prayed for him.

Every life holds pain and strife,
Each life holds delight;
Through their paths' entanglement
May he walk aright.
Like her, so today
For my child I pray.

May her Babe, as quick years flow,
Hand in hand with my child go,
Holding him with loving arm
Safe from hurt and free from harm.

Child Welfare Studies

Conducted by E. A. P.

To Every Child Belongs the Right

- To be well born
- To be educated
- To be protected from child-labor
- To be morally safeguarded
- To be spiritually trained

How early in life does the child form mental images? What is an important factor in developing such images? How much time may well be spent by the parent in watching the mental growth of the very young child?

Is a strong imagination of value to the child? Who is his companion in the early, and perhaps most important, years in the land of "Make Believe"?

All life is to the child—what? Is play as real to the child as work?

Do fairy stories and myths have any effect upon the child's conception of right and wrong and of great virtues?

How may we put to a constructive use this great creative element of the child's nature? What are some of the effects upon the child of "acting out" with a little group of companions, pretty little stories?

What effect does the recitation of great life stories have upon the child? How do these life stories add to the child's concept of life and service?

"SAFEGUARD AMERICA'S FUTURE"

Inspire America's Youth With Civic Ideals

Mary B. Ervin

In Athens long ago boys were taught a pledge. They said it each day, believed in it and tried to live by it. Fathers taught their sons, who, when they were grown up, gave it to their own boys. Each helped make the pledge true until Athens became "Athens, the Beautiful."

Pledge of the Athenian Youth

"We will never bring disgrace to this our city, by any act of dishonesty or cowardice, nor ever desert our comrades; we will fight for the ideals and sacred things of the city, both alone and with many; we will revere and obey the city laws and do our best to incite a like respect and reverence in others; we will strive unceasingly to quicken the public's sense of civic duty; that thus in all these ways we may transmit this city, greater, better and more beautiful than it was transmitted to us."

Such a pledge taught to the American youth today and passed on to future generations would make our own loved land truly "America, the Beautiful."

The principles involved in this pledge are the underlying ones of our Loyal Temperance Legion movement.

Enlist the children today and help make America "greater, better and more beautiful than it was transmitted to us."

An Apron Social

The wide-awake white ribboners of Timewell, Illinois, recently sent out dainty miniature aprons with the following clever invitation:

"The Timewell W. C. T. U. asks in rhyme
A donation from friends in any clime.
The marvelous big task has just begun,
More work in all lines must be done.
The white ribboners ask you to share

Your national L. T. L. secretary had the pleasure at one time of visiting this local union and its progressive band of Loyal Temperance Legioners.

An "apron social" of this type would furnish a practical plan for helping to finance the work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and the Loyal Temperance Legion of any community.

Have you ordered your copy of the 1922 L. T. L. Year Book? It is full of helps and hints for organizing and maintaining a Loyal Temperance Legion. Price, two cents each. Send to National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, Evanston, Illinois.

A heading containing pledge, slogan and other introductory matter for L. T. L. National Prohibition Guard Enrollment sheets can now be procured from the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House. Organizers, Sunday School workers and local W. C. T. U. members will find these enrollment headings most valuable in enlisting the children. Price, three cents per copy; fifteen cents per dozen.

The L. T. L. supplementary lesson manual, "A Course in Citizenship and Patriotism" can now be secured from the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House. Price, $2.00. This book is a collection of fascinating and inspiring poems and stories, designed to stir in the heart of the child patriotism and an ambition to do effective public service as a citizen, and should be in the hands of every L. T. L. leader.

The Child and the Year

Said the child to the youthful year:
"What hast thou in store for me,
O giver of beautiful gifts, what cheer,
What joy dost thou bring with thee?"

"My seasons four shall bring
Their treasures: the winter's snows,
The autumn's store, and the flowers of spring,
And the summer's perfect rose.

"All these and more shall be thine,
Dear child—but the last and best
Thyself must earn by a strife divine,
If thou wouldst be truly blest.

"Wouldst know this last, best gift?
'Tis a conscience clear and bright,
A peace of mind which the soul can lift
To an infinite delight.

"Truth, patience, courage and love,
If thou unto me canst bring,
I will set thee all earth's ills above,
O child! and crown thee a king!"

—Celia Thaxter.

The Gordon L. T. L. Prizes

The Loyal Temperance Legion is again indebted to Miss Anna A. Gordon, president of the National W. C. T. U., for her splendid L. T. L. membership prize offer.

Ten dollars will be awarded to the state making the largest net gain in membership and five dollars to the state making the largest per cent gain during the fiscal year, 1922.

Last year Georgia was the proud winner of the ten dollars and Kansas merited the five dollar prize. This year the states are heartily entering into a friendly rivalry for the winning of these prizes.

The Loyal Temperance Legion in song and story endeavors to develop ideal methods for bringing scriptural, scientific and governmental temperance truths to bear upon young lives, and through its various departmental activities to train for Christian citizenship and for moral leadership the men and women of tomorrow.

Is It Worth While?

Ellen Dayton Blair

In all my years of L. T. L. work, as an organizer and as state L. T. L. secretary in three states, I have never enjoyed my association with the children and their leaders more than I have in Southern California. I love the work as sincerely as I did forty years ago.

May I give you just a few of my delightful experiences? First, I wish to tell you of the sweet, loving messages I received from the legioners while I was a "shut-in" three times from accidents. They came from near and far, all saying, "We are praying for you to get well." I believe they helped my speedy and complete recovery. Again came warm and happy greetings, with numberless bouquets of roses, when I visited many of these legioners later.

It thrilled me the other day, when I gave a Bible reading to the Strickland Home for boys, to find every one of the fifty-two had a Testament in his pocket, and while I was drawing a picture of a shepherd holding a lamb, five boys found and read as quickly as adults could do the selections I had given them.

At Highland Park, on pledge-signing day, the enthusiastic members showered me with questions arising from study of our L. T. L. pledge which, in part is, "I promise not to buy, drink, sell or give alcoholic liquors while I live." These were some of the queries:

"If I buy alcohol for my mother to use in preparing a medicine, shall I break my pledge?"

"Does alcohol in all drinks always bite the tongue?"

"There is 48 per cent of alcohol in vanilla extract. How about buying that?"

"Is there alcohol in the cider they are selling in little barrels?"

"Is there alcohol in root beer?"

"Our treasurer told Mary she was not coming any more, so we elected a new one while she was away, and now Elizabeth has come back and wants to be treasurer again. Which is our treasurer now? May we vote on it, please?"

Do you wonder that I love the work? Come and enjoy it with me. I am leading seven L. T. L.'s, one of them meeting weekly, and it is prolonging my life. Do you doubt it?

A friend writes me: "My mother had a Loyal Temperance Legion in our home town for years, till her strength failed. She is in heaven now, but one of her legioners was a winner of the prize offered for the best essay written by a college student. I can't help thinking it pleased mother even in heaven."

Is it not worth while?

STUDIES IN GOVERNMENT

CITIZENSHIP IN THE UNITED STATES

Deborah Knox Livingston National Director of Christian Citizenship

The Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States deals with citizenship and reads thus:

"All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States, and of the state wherein they reside. No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

This amendment shows that there are two ways of becoming a citizen, by birth or by naturalization.

Citizenship by Birth

Any person born in the United States is a citizen, even though his parents may be citizens of another country. While this has been the law from the very beginning of our government, there are some notable exceptions:

1. Indians who refuse to adopt the habits of civilized life and take up a separate residence, but continue to remain in tribal relationship, are excluded from citizenship, although they are born in this country.

2. The children of foreign ambassadors, born in this country are not citizens of the United States but of the country which the parent represents.

3. Children that are born to alien parents on public vessels lying in American ports.

4. The children of alien enemies in hostile occupation of American territory.

Citizenship by Naturalization

A person desiring to become a citizen of the United States by naturalization, must first make a declaration of intention to become a citizen, and second, make a petition for citizenship. These are commonly called first and second papers. The first may be made at any time after the alien lands in this country; the second cannot be taken until two years after the declaration of intention has been made and not until the applicant has resided for five years in this country and for one year in the state or district in which the application has been made.

Requirements for Naturalization

The applicant must be twenty-one years of age, of good character and be able to speak English, to sign his name, and have some understanding of the Constitution and of our form of government.

He must have two witnesses, who know him personally, and upon their oath declare that he has been here for five years.

Only persons of the white and black races may be naturalized. The naturalization of Chinese is specifically prohibited.

The United States District Courts and the supreme courts of the states have the power to naturalize aliens.

Citizenship of Women

The citizenship of women in the United States depends upon whether they are single or married, as married women take their citizenship from their husbands.

Unmarried Women

An unmarried woman holds the same citizenship with which she was born, unless her parents or guardians changed it for her before she became of age, or unless she has changed it after coming of age. When she is twenty-one years old she can change her citizenship on exactly the same terms as a man.

Married Women

A married woman's citizenship is the same as her husband's. When she marries she loses her own and takes his, if it is different, and if he changes his citizenship while they are married, hers changes also. If she is an alien and marries an American citizen, she becomes a citizen, too.

If on the contrary she is an American citizen and marries an alien, she becomes an alien.

The injustice of such a law is self-evident and it is proposed to change the law governing married women, so that their citizenship may not depend upon their marriage but upon their own free choice.

Protection of Citizens

The Fourteenth Amendment also provides for the protection of the life, liberty and property of the citizen. Not one of these can be taken from him without the due process of law. This protection is not only given within the borders of the United States but is guaranteed to all American citizens in foreign countries.

QUESTIONS

1. With what does the Fourteenth Amendment deal?
2. What are the two ways of becoming a citizen of the United States?
3. What is citizenship by birth?
4. Name four exceptions.
5. How do aliens become naturalized?
6. What are the requirements for naturalization?
7. Upon what does the citizenship of women in the United States depend?
8. What is the citizenship of unmarried women?
9. What is the citizenship of married women?
10. Upon what should the citizenship of women depend?
11. What does the Fourteenth Amendment further provide?
12. What protection is guaranteed to American citizens in foreign countries?

THE ENEMY

Frances S. Hallowes

CHAPTER I

"What an enchanting face!"

These words came from the lips of one of two men who hung over the rail of a P. and O. boat at Marseilles, watching the late arrivals, bustling and pushing in with their baggage, fearful of being left behind; for the ship "Persia" was due to leave for India at this moment.

His companion started, and looking in the direction intimated, saw a girl coming up the stairs carrying a large dressing-bag. She glanced upward with a look of appeal, as if asking for help,—her blue eyes a little distended, her sweet mouth open in the effort of mounting with the weight she bore.

"Allow me," and the speaker was at her side before she could object, and had taken the bag.

"Oh, thank you," she blushed and smiled, "but I must not trouble you. Can you find me a porter?"

"They all seem busy just now with late arrivals. Let me carry your bag to your cabin."

"It is not mine, but my friend's. She asked me to guard it till her return, and as the whistle sounded and she did not come, I thought I might carry it; but it is heavy," and she sighed her relief.

"What number is your cabin?"

"Seventy-nine, but I am sorry to trouble you thus."

They threaded their way without more words through the crowded deck and downstairs.

"Here we are," and he placed the bag just inside, raised his cap and returned to his friend.

"It was a weight, what on earth could it contain? I suppose lots of toilet silver, odds and ends of jewelry."

"Those things would not account for its weight; more likely bottles or bombs."

"What a malign suggestion!"

"Well, it has been done before; many a fair girl is used for bomb throwing!"

"It is desecration to think of such a thing in connection with that pure face!"

"Hard hit, old fellow! Well, my susceptible youth, make use of the next fortnight, but don't take it too seriously."

At this moment the ship began to move. "Off, off to the East! Good luck to you, my boy."

"Same to you, Major, let us go and settle our traps."

These two men were very unlike in appearance. The elder, Major Orde, an Irishman, was short and rotund, and slightly bald. With a weather-seasoned face and a humorous twinkle in his eye, he looked as if fortune had treated him well.

An inveterate joker, he saw life in its most comic aspects. He was in his early prime, and was returning to India, after furlough, to rejoin his regiment in Assam.

The younger man, Bertram Harford, was a tall, smooth-faced, athletic young Englishman, with a firm mouth and prominent chin. His eyes were grey under level brows; his dark hair waved above a broad forehead. Altogether he gave the impression of strength and determination. A habit of tossing up his head with an impatient gesture gave him somewhat of an imperious air. He was well dressed in tweed clothes, cut by a good tailor, and was a very distinct personality in a crowd of average men.

His destination was India, for he had lately passed into the Civil Service very near the head of the list. He had had his choice of a home or an Indian appointment, but had chosen India. His friendship with Major Orde dated from their embarkation at Folkestone. The Major had been attracted by his appearance, and he had been drawn by the Major's bonhomme and evident experi-

On her way to the Mexican border, she stops at Indianapolis, for a state law enforcement meeting, on February 8, and spends the following Saturday and Sunday in San Antonio, Texas.

Our New Serial

With this issue we begin our new serial, "The Enemy," an abridged form of the book by Frances E. Hallowes, published in London. You cannot afford to miss a chapter of this fascinating story. Send in your subscriptions at once, as we cannot promise to furnish back copies of the paper.

Iceland's Fish Situation

Brave little Iceland, the first country to enact a constitutional prohibitory law, is facing a serious situation. Spain is boycotting the shipment of fish from Iceland because as a prohibition nation the latter has no further use for the Spanish alcoholic beverages. Our sympathy goes out to our comrades in Iceland, but we have little apprehension that the economic pressure being brought to bear will cause any weakening of the dry law. The suffering and death among these fisher folk occasioned by the use of alcoholic liquors were responsible for this legislation. Serious indeed would be the economic extremity that would force Iceland to abandon so beneficent a policy.

Poland's Women to the Rescue

Of what vital import is the closing paragraph of the special cablegram from Poland that appeared in the papers last week: "The victory for the drys in the Polish diet is attributed to the seven women deputies." History repeats itself. The women, as the keenest sufferers from the liquor evil, are the first to recognize the necessity of safeguarding their nations by a prohibitory law. Congratulations to the women and to the men of Poland for having taken this first fine stand for their emancipation from the liquor evil by adopting a law prohibiting the trade in all beverages containing above two and one-half per cent of alcohol. A year's experience not only will demonstrate to them the advantages of even that degree of prohibition but will also convince them of the wisdom of following the example of the United States in limiting the alcoholic content to half of one per cent.

God bless the women law makers of Poland, who have "crusaded" so effectively in legislative halls for the happiness and welfare of their country. We hope we may have one or more of them as delegates to our World's W. C. T. U. convention, that they may tell us the story of their triumph!

Sound The Alarm!

If there is a calendar within range of your vision, please look at it. Fix your eyes upon the figure that marks the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November. Then count the months, the weeks, the days that intervene between the present moment and that fateful date. Every day of those weeks, every week of those months will be filled with high-powered, well-paid activity on the part of the thirty or more organizations opposed to national prohibition; they will be occupied with efforts to flood the newspapers of this country with falsehoods, misrepresentations and confusing statements, half true, half false, this with the one aim to make the public believe that national prohibition is a failure, and that because it is a failure, and can never be enforced, a Congress must be elected at the November election pledged to repeal or modify the Volstead Law to permit the return of traffic in wine and beer. You realize what that means? It means a virtual nullification of the Eighteenth Amendment, for without an adequate enforcement law, the Eighteenth Amendment becomes a mere "scrap of paper."

If the above statement is true, how are we, the members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, to use the time that intervenes between now and the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November?

We are going to keep constantly before us the fact that at that time all of the House of Representatives and one-third of the U. S. Senate are to be elected. And we not only are going to keep it in our own minds, but, in season and out of season, remind our friends and neighbors and acquaintances of it, in the same breath telling them what is involved, and getting them to promise to help re-elect the Congressmen from their district and the Senators from their state who have championed dry legislation and also elect to office new candidates who are pledged to stand for the retention of the Volstead Law.

We are going to carry on a counter campaign of publicity, and try to get the papers in our towns to publish the real news about prohibition, what the law has done for the country, and how much has already been gained in the first two years of its enforcement. We are going to talk down "prohibition a failure" and talk up "prohibition a success."

We are going to win for the Woman's Christian Temperance Union a million recruits to help us in this "truth-telling" campaign, and make certain that every good woman in the nation will go to the polls next November and cast her ballot for members of both houses of Congress who stand for the enforcement of the national prohibition law.

Keep your calendar in sight, put a circle around the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, and pray and work and work and pray for victory.

REMINISCENCES OF LINCOLN

By Frances E. Willard

I never saw Abraham Lincoln alive. He visited Evanston where he was the guest of Gen. Julius White and went up to the Theological school where, tradition says, he jumped with the boys in some of their gymnastic exercises. He certainly captured them all, for my brother Oliver came home saying what a splendid man he was,—how genial and approachable. My father had the honor of introducing Abraham Lincoln, also Cassius M. Clay of Kentucky, when they made annual addresses before the Wisconsin State Agricultural Society. I remember how Lincoln's address impressed me when I heard it. He told the story of the eastern monarch who commanded his wise men to furnish him a sentence which he could always feel was appropriate to every occasion. They gave him these words: "And this, too, shall pass away."

Poor Lincoln! The loss of his sweetheart, Ann Rutledge, when he was not over twenty, and which broke his heart once for all, gave deepest meaning to this phrase.

The news of his assassination was brought to our house April 14, 1864, by Kate Jackson. We lived then at Swampscott by the Lake. Early in the morning Kate came while I was dressing, with the terrible words, "Lincoln has been shot." We were so dazed we hardly knew what we were doing, but instinctively went to the depot and set out for the city, with the wish to be with as many other mourners as we could; at least, I suppose this was the meaning of our action. Already the depot, the great swinging bridges, the long blocks of commerce buildings were lined with black. The city was in mourning. It was given out by means of placards that there would be a meeting at the First M. E. Church at noon. We crowded in with the rest. The place was packed. Kate and I sat in the gallery at the left of the pulpit,—in the church where just ten years later almost to a day, I was to make the first temperance speech of my life. Never did I so covet the gift of oratory as on that day when men who had no such power essayed to speak on Lincoln.

A week after, his funeral cortege passed along Michigan Avenue, and Mrs. John L. Scripps, then the leading woman in Chicago by reason of her great talents and her husband's wealth and prestige, invited me with many others to the rare opportunity of viewing the procession from the windows of her drawing room. The room was full of elegant ladies. Mrs. Scripps' talk was most exhilarating. We watched for hours as the endless procession passed. Finally the black catafalque with its precious burden came into view. That night I arose about one o'clock. From the home of Thomas W. Milner whose daughter, Belle, had been my roommate at the Woman's College, and with her, her sisters Louise and Victoria, and escorted by her brother James, we made our way in the heart of the night to the court house, under whose dome lay all that remained of Lincoln. The processions were so long during the day that one had to wait for hours; and even now we had to fall in behind others as we entered the court house where soldiers were on every hand, and especially impressive to me were two immense statuesque figures—one at the head, and one at the foot of the coffin. If they had been marble they could not have been more motionless. Just as we passed beside the bier, the sweet pure voice of a woman was singing up in the dome somewhere the tender words,

"Flee as a bird to its mountain, O, thou who art weary of sin, Flee to the clear flowing fountain, where thou may'st wash and be clean."

I think no hymn ever impressed me so deeply before. I looked with loving and lingering gaze on that face so full of pathos, and of kindness; on the strong hand that had signed the proclamation that emancipated the four millions of slaves. And so we passed on silently into the outer darkness.

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awak'ning continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

Lincoln's Half Hour

Col. W. H. Cook, President Lincoln's bodyguard in 1865 at the White House, in his recollections recently published in a magazine says: "At eight o'clock in the morning, immediately upon dressing, the President would go into the library, where he would sit in his favorite chair in the middle of the room and read a chapter or two in the Bible. I think I am safe in saying that this was President Lincoln's invariable custom—at least, it was such during the time I was on duty with him. At about eight-thirty he would join Mrs. Lincoln and little Tad for breakfast..... As soon as breakfast was over, the President would go to his office and begin his ceaseless toil."

This glimpse of Abraham Lincoln's morning half-hour with the Bible, every day, is commended to the consideration of those who say they "have no time to read the Bible." Is it possible for any one to-day, in all America, to have any such ceaseless and awful burden of work and responsibility as Lincoln had at that time in the White House? No man since has carried such a load for the nation and for the world. Yet Lincoln had time for half an hour, alone with the word of God, as a preparation for the day's incessant and weary toil. It was part of his wisdom and greatness of mind that he recognized the deep sources of strength that lay in that beginning for each harassing day.—Exchange.

Lincoln and Prohibition

There have been many biographies of Abraham Lincoln written, many books on different phases of his many-sided life. Among those which every true admirer of the Great Emancipator will want is the new book by Charles T. White, entitled, "Lincoln and Prohibition." While naturally some of the material is familiar, there is much that has not been furnished by other writers.

In the introduction, written by Postmaster General Will H. Hays, the following tribute is paid to the patriotism of Lincoln: "It was the patriotism of good citizenship, at the fireside, the plow, the mart, in low places and in high places, in season and out of season; it was the patriotism which caused him to make his country's welfare his own business and to interest himself continually in the practical politics of his community. Always he believed in and acted the patriotism of peace as well as of war."

Many people have forgotten that in 1855 there was a campaign in Illinois for state prohibition, and few are familiar with Lincoln's part in it. The chapters devoted to this campaign are of great interest. Says the author: "The corroborative evidence by Mr. Baber, an entirely competent and conservative man, that Lincoln campaigned for the dry law in the summer of 1855, although he was supposed to be so much engrossed with the anti-slavery agitation as not to be able to do so, and the further fact that Stephen A. Douglas threw his power against the prohibition law, is of more than passing interest. Both incidents are in harmony with the life practices and professed principles of the two men—Lincoln believing that a moral idea was the mightiest thing beneath the throne of God, and Douglas not caring whether it was or not."

A letter by J. B. Merwin on the same subject tells how nearly prohibition won: "Mr. Lincoln drew the prohibitory law. The legislature passed it, submitting it to a vote of the people. We came near—we did carry it, but Kentucky, Missouri, and Wisconsin poured in nearly 20,000 illegal votes in the counties bordering on those states, and then with those counted, beat us with only a little over 14,000 votes. Some hard cases voted with us. I asked Mr. Lincoln if we wanted such votes.

"'Want them? Of course we do. I have lived here many years. I have never seen saints marching in battalions in Illinois yet. First the blade, then the ear, then the full corn, etc. Work with any and all who will help us.

"'Welcome one, ten, ten thousand,' Mr. Lincoln said in his plain, pathetic way. 'We must meet the traffic in one of two ways. We must furnish the recruits to keep up the ever-increasing army of drunkards, or we must take temptation out of the way of the rising generation by prohibiting it. Which way do you prefer to meet the traffic?'"

NEW YORK REGIONAL CONFERENCE AROUSES NEW ENTHUSIASM

Mrs. D. Leigh Colvin, Vice-President-at-Large, New York W. C. T. U.

The first of the five regional conferences to be held in New York state took place in New York City, January 24. Eleven counties sent splendid delegations. Only two counties failed to have all their county Trio-Team present. There were fifty local presidents, twenty-eight local secretaries, and sixteen local treasurers in attendance. Mrs. Ella A. Boole, state president, presided and presented the membership campaign plans. Miss Margaret Sloat, state corresponding secretary, spoke on dollar dues. Five state superintendents gave practical suggestions as an aid to local unions in carrying on the work of their departments.

Our national Y. P. B. general secretary, Mrs. Maude B. Perkins, and the state secretary, Miss Helen G. H. Estelle, spoke for the Young People's Branch. Local presidents told of the experiences of their unions in raising their budget money. Citizenship was discussed by the new vice-president of the state. Mrs. Martha M. Allen spoke of the questionnaire sent out by the American Medical Association and its results. Mrs. Anna P. George presented the work of the children in the Loyal Temperance Legion. Mrs. Janette Beach, in her unique and humorous way, read a paper on "The Results of Prohibition." Among other things she said that "the torch of liberty was no longer an alcohol lamp."

The most enjoyable feature of the program was the three-minute speech contest. Ten women, local presidents, one county treasurer, state lecturers, superintendents and evangelists participated. The topic was "Law Enforcement and the Work of the W. C. T. U." These talks were bright, humorous, earnest, and packed full of worth while facts. The prize of a year's subscription to THE UNION SIGNAL (and they are all subscribers or they couldn't have done so well) was awarded to Mrs. Ayres, treasurer of Orange county W. C. T. U.

Dinner was served at night to one hundred and ninety-two guests. This was followed by the showing to a crowded audience of the S. T. I. film, "Safeguarding the Nation." New York state has purchased one of these films and employs Miss Estelle to promote its presentation in motion picture houses, schools and churches.

The auditorium of the church was filled all day and evening, and many spoke of the great benefit and pleasure they derived from the conference.

The Health Department

P. S. Bourdeau-Sisco, M. D.
National Superintendent

The National W. C. T. U. is said to have but one department and that—the "Do Everything" department! But the very fact that it maintains so many departments is evidence of its mobility, and its adaptability for growth. The organization concentrated its forces and had a glorious part in making the nation dry, and now it is training these same forces with equal zeal to keep the nation dry. It can mobilize its forces at will to engage in Child Welfare, Americanization, or Social Morality work, or drives for a million dollars, or a million members. This very scope of endeavor and versatility make the W. C. T. U. the powerful factor it is for moral betterment of men and women.

The Health department partakes of this mobility. In its very nature, it adapts itself easily to the great objectives of the national organization. It may be effectively used in the drive for one million members. The plan for at least one Health meeting held each year by each local union, each Y. P. B., and each L. T. L., is a wise one. But in addition to these special Health meetings there should be others for the public. Such meetings can be made very attractive. The "Plan of Work," and high points in the Health program for 1922 give valuable suggestions. At all these meetings there should be a call for new members, adult members, young people, and children. Health meetings, as well as other meetings of the organization, can be made recruiting occasions. Let all Health superintendents work to this end. Our opportunities were never greater.

"Therefore I Should Take—"

The following was taken from a missionary magazine, but is equally helpful for a UNION SIGNAL Day party. The leader acts as "teacher," and may be dressed in an old-fashioned gown if desired. She has a ruler, proceeds to call the "school" to order, and arrange the "pupils" for recitation. The lesson consists of repeating after the "teacher", ten reasons for taking THE UNION SIGNAL, each ending with the words, "Therefore I should take THE UNION SIGNAL." The "teacher" follows this up by taking subscriptions and dismisses the class.

This will make a good ending to a program which shows the various lines in which THE UNION SIGNAL serves the W. C. T. U. membership and others.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

Home Education in Citizenship

"Back to the Evening Lamp"

Citizenship in any country and what it stands for is revealed through the literature, history and biography of that country.

The United States Bureau of Education, Department of the Interior, has issued as a part of its work in home education, several reading courses particularly adapted for the use of those who are interested in knowing the facts of the discovery and colonization of our country and the causes of its remarkable growth and expansion, economically, politically, socially, and nationally.

The following home reading courses are ready for distribution:

1. Great Literary Bibles.
2. Great Literature—Ancient, Mediæval, and Modern.
3. Miscellaneous Reading course for Parents.
4. Miscellaneous Reading course for Boys.

Federal Commissioner of Education Commends Plan

In commendation of the plan, the Commissioner of Education, John J. Tigert, says: "These Home Reading courses are something that the people of this country need more than anything else. Since coming to this country I have been astounded to find so little reading after graduation from high school. Instead of considering that period of education as merely an incentive to a better education to be acquired not only from travel but from reading the classics, they seem to think it the end of their acquisition of culture."

Among the biographies listed in the course is "The Life of Frances E. Willard."

Reading Course No. 8—American Literature—names the following books:

1. The American.....Henry James
2. Autocrat of the Breakfast Table.....Oliver Wendell Holmes

Hiram

Solomon would an artist hire
Out of the cunning heart of Tyre.
They sent him Hiram in reply
Picked from the tribe of Naphtali.
Such was the wisdom found in him
He could fashion the awesome cherubim,
Pillars of brass, and molten sea,
Fruit from the fair pomegranate tree.
Bloom of the lily, lattice-set,
And warring beasts, accordant met,
Held in a wild resplendent fret.

Son of a widow. Neighbors said,
"Blessing and honor crown her head."
Forth from the city did she fare
Afar with him, his fame to share?
Over his house to rule, and spread
Feasts of curd and leavened bread,
Mellowing figs, and the honey red,
Strengthening heart and hand of him
Who fashioned those awesome cherubim?
Of this or that no record runs,
But worthy mothers, worthy sons.

There has not come to us a line
To say that Hiram drank no wine,
But maddened brain has never planned,
And never has wrought the shaking hand
Such blossom and bell and meshing vine
As clothed that ancient temple shrine.
Though all is dust, the story old
While men have speech shall be retold.
Truth makes a thousand years as one:
Still Hiram lives, the widow's son,
Skillful artist and trusty man—
One of the world's great temperance clan.

"That Vow I Have Never Broken"

The following story is told of ex-President Benjamin Harrison:

At a public dinner given him, when he was candidate for President of the United States, one of the guests rather conspicuously drank to his health. The general pledged his toast by drinking water. Another gentleman offered a toast, and said, "General, will you favor me by drinking a glass of wine?"

The general begged to be excused. He was again urged to join in a glass of wine.

This was too much. He arose from his seat, and said:

"Gentlemen, I have twice refused to partake of the wine. I hope that this will be sufficient. Though you press the matter ever so much, not a drop shall pass my lips. I made a resolve when I started in life that I would avoid strong drink. That vow I have never broken."

Harvard Professor Notes Decrease in Drinking Among College Students

Professor Henry A. Yeomans, in his report as dean of Harvard College, covering the academic year 1920-1921, says the students of his college are more mature, more responsible and more sensible of their obligations to the community than were the undergraduates of one or two decades ago.

"They take a keener interest in the problems of the general community," says the report, "and react more sharply to its feelings and opinions. The use of alcoholic liquors, for instance, illustrates this tendency. Fewer students drink alcoholic liquors and fewer students drink to excess than ever before."

Prohibition Essay Contest

Through the generosity of Col. Fred N. Dow, of Portland, Maine, son of General Neal Dow, the Father of American Prohibition, the Intercollegiate Prohibition Association is enabled to offer to foreign students attending American colleges three special prizes of $100, $50, and $25 respectively for the best original essays on some aspect of the alcohol problem or measures for its solution. The contest is open to any student who is a citizen of another country and who is enrolled as a student in an American college or university or other institution of learning during the academic year 1921-1922.

All students intending to enter the contest should send their names and addresses to the National office of the I. P. A., 14 West Washington St., Chicago, Illinois, on or before February 15, 1922.

All manuscripts must reach the I. P. A. office not later than June 1, 1922.

The prizes will be awarded July first, 1922.

No Age Limit For the Student!

In an address emphasizing the need for professors and instructors in universities and colleges to continue their study and training in order to better equip themselves for their work, President Walter Dill Scott of Northwestern University, says:

"This question was raised in the late war in connection with the activities of the generals of the United States army. The best school of instruction I ever attended was the school at Le Mans, France, in which every student was a general. The half-day I was privileged to attend this school, an English colonel was in charge and about twenty-five of our generals were in attendance. Possibly every general there was a graduate of West Point; certainly all of them had spent more than a decade in intensive study of military tactics and yet these generals regarded it as a privilege to attend this school. I am convinced that the 'generals' school' might well be duplicated at every university and college in America." He might well have added "and in every line of endeavor."

Virginia Notes on W. C. T. U. Progress

Virginia's state president, Mrs. Sara H. Hoge, and Mr. Hoge, after a few weeks' stay at Atlantic City for rest and change, are back in Richmond. The legislature is now in biennial session, with many important measures before it, including one strengthening the prohibition enforcement laws.

Mrs. Emma H. Howland, national organizer and lecturer, has been engaged for the month of April for work in the state.

Mrs. R. L. Justiss, field secretary for Virginia, has been doing much personal work, re-organizing old unions, starting new ones, and making friends wherever she has gone.

In addition to THE SIGNAL program for January 16, helpful and suggestive forewords were sent out to every union by Mrs. Lilian A. Shepherd, state corresponding secretary.

Danville, the hostess of the next state convention, through Mrs. Bettie A. Lee, local president and county superintendent, is having an effective and wide series of Scientific Temperance Instruction essay contests in the schools, followed up by effort to place the Temperance Day programs in every school in the large county of Pittsylvania, of which Mrs. Thomas J. Fitzgerald, a New Yorker, is the progressive leader.

The Way of the Transgressor in Michigan a Hard One

Myrta E. Lockwood, Recording Secretary

January 15 was Jubilee Field Day with Michigan white ribboners. No more fitting way to round up Jubilee deficits than by celebrating the "Passing of the Bar" with a Jubilee thank offering. Accordingly, speakers were dated in all sections of the state where the quota had not been paid. Offerings and pledges were taken, interest was aroused, members secured, new unions organized—and the New Year was begun right in Michigan.

At a recent luncheon in Detroit, given in honor of Commissioner Roy Haynes, a Civilian Vigilance Committee was formed, the purpose of which is law enforcement. This was said by James A. White of the Ohio Anti-Saloon League and others present to be the most representative body ever brought together for the purpose. The U. S. District Attorney was there as were also the prosecuting attorney, police commissioner, superintendent of the police department, enforcement agents and representatives of the W. C. T. U., Woman's Federation of Clubs, League of Women Voters, Council of Churches, and the Anti-Saloon League.

Commissioner Haynes spoke five times in the one day. He appeared not only at this luncheon, but at a business men's club, before the great Methodist conference then in session, as well as before 1400 Baptists at a meeting, closing the great day with a mass meeting.

Truly the way of the transgressor is hard in Michigan. Enforcement agents are on the track. Citizens are waking to the vital needs of the hour. A campaign of education is on. Institutes will be held over the state during the next three months. An intensive membership campaign is planned and we expect to go to our state convention with a shout of jubilee because our white ribbon enrollment is doubled and the money all raised.

We Second the Brewer's Motion

Some time ago, a widely known brewer wrote this letter to a friend who vouches for its genuineness. The friend had always opposed prohibition, but his comment on the letter is: "To my thinking the communication is plain horse sense."

You don't expect approval from a brewer on your stand that there is too much prohibition politics, but here is mine, and for these reasons:

The talk is all about the Volstead Act, concurrent power, the percentage of alcohol to be permitted in vinous or malt liquors, and so forth. What a brewer wants is to get rid of the Eighteenth Amendment altogether. If we can't get that we might as well drop the subject.

A lot of politicians want to amend the Volstead Act to make it easier on us. To put that over will require a fund and we will have to provide it. Well, say the act is so amended; all right. We go ahead. The drys get busy then to amend the bill back again so it will be more prohibitory. They have a fund for that. But we got to get another fund to fight that amendment. If we win the drys come back again and we got to finance another fight against them.

Like this it was when we were fighting against local option. When we won we only won another chance to put up for another fight. When we lost we had to put up another fight. It was rich pickings for the political grafters. Now we will have got this kind of thing in Congress each session and in each state Legislature under concurrent power legislation—to stop concurrence, or to amend concurrence so as to get a little higher per cent beer, or to stop the lowering of the per cent. Fighting prohibition and local option that way cost the brewers millions of dollars. Who got it? Grafters. We had no peace.

If people want light wines and beer all they can do is put them in the Eighteenth Amendment of the Constitution and how much shall be the alcohol allowed in them. All the rest is what you call political bunk to tap the brewers for campaign funds for politicians who want to hold power in the cities.

Maybe the time will come yet, after the nuisance of prohibition has been three or five years with us, that the people will want their beer and light wines bad enough to support an amendment to the Eighteenth Amendment that will put the light wines and beers in the Constitution. There is no other way. I am out of the brewing business and will stay out until I know what I can brew and for how long I can brew.

That's why I say you are right in saying there is too much prohibition talk in politics. Let the people get their full of this prohibition stuff. Then we may do something, not before.

As to that, every prohibitionist is willing to take all the chances. "Let the people get their full of prohibition." So say we all of us. If that should bring back the saloon, then America would deserve nothing better.

We second the brewer's motion.

—Epworth Herald.

USE A MOTION PICTURE PROGRAM TO CREATE PUBLIC SENTIMENT FOR THE 18TH AMENDMENT

The prohibition law will fulfill its purpose only when the public demands the enforcement of this law.

"SAFEGUARDING THE NATION" is not a theatrical film but a presentation of scientific laboratory experiments, showing the effects of alcohol upon the body. The truths presented will help fulfill the purpose of the prohibition law.

"Wonderful! Everybody should see it", says Dr. Royal S. Copeland, Commissioner of Health, New York City.

The Enemy

ence of everything appertaining to official India.

The friends were half-way through dinner when a little commotion heralded the entrance of two ladies into the dining-saloon.

One, an overdressed woman of forty-five, costumed, coiffured and perfumed, the other a slender, graceful girl in a simple white silk blouse and skirt. They sat down at the next table with their backs to the men.

"The girl of your adventure!" whispered the Major.

Harford was scanning the backs of his neighbors.

"There is a great deal of character in backs," he rejoined.

"As much as in palms; introduce a new science—what will you call it?"

Harford did not reply. The pretty figure with its slender, uncompressed waist, the long, graceful throat, and the wavy, piled-up brown hair with glints of gold which broke out into tiny tendrils wherever possible, satisfied the aesthetic taste of the man. He had had very little opportunity of intercourse with girls, but he had none the less an exalted idea of their possibilities.

His reverie continued while they were busy with their dinner, and was interrupted by the waiter thrusting a wine list under his eyes.

"What are you going to drink, Harford?" asked the Major.

"Oh, water!"

"Water! Surely not! Wake up, man, you are dreaming over that girl."

Harford brought back his eyes from the pretty figure to the Major's face.

"I said water, and I mean it. I'm a total abstainer."

The Major almost jumped. He shrugged his shoulders deprecatingly.

"You'll have to give that up in India; no one drinks water there."

"Really! well, I shall."

"You'll soon change your mind, my dear fellow."

"Shall I, why? Kindly explain."

"Certainly; the climate needs a stimulant, and the water is impure."

"Strange! I thought a hot climate demanded abstinence from strong drink, and as to impure water, it can always be boiled and filtered. Besides, I hear there are capital water schemes being carried out in the big stations of India."

"Well, I should be afraid to drink water."

"And, excuse a tu quoque Major, I should be afraid to drink your medicated poisons."

"Be advised, my boy, you'll find it hard to swim against the stream of Anglo-Indian society. Folks won't like your abstaining habits."

Harford threw up his head, and his eyes flashed for a moment. Then in a quiet voice, he said,

"Thanks, Major, you mean well, but I suppose I may be allowed to choose my own drinks without the dictation of society. If I choose to abstain from eating potatoes, it is no one's business, and if I choose to abstain from alcohol, I have as much right as you have to drink it."

"Oh, certainly, my dear fellow. Go your own way, but you'll be thought a crank."

Harford winced at the word, and the Major followed up his advantage.

"You are young, and people don't like the young to differ from them."

"Yes, I'm a 'fresher,' as they say in Cambridge, but none the less in my right mind, and assured of my position as regards drinking alcohol."

"Well, you must 'dree your own weird,' headstrong boy."

The "headstrong boy" was watching the waiter who held the wine list before the ladies at the next table.

His face lighted up as he saw the girl shake her head and pour out a glass of water. The elder woman ordered wine.

"At least the girl was wise enough to know it will spoil her roses," he thought.

The men left the dining-saloon and sauntered up on deck. Harford waited about at the head of the stairs, hoping that the girl and her companion would appear. He was not disappointed. His tall figure was not easily overlooked, and as the women ascended, their eyes were on him.

The girl blushed and whispered something hurriedly to her friend, who nodded and smiled in a friendly, free-and-easy way to Harford as she came up to him.

"I have to thank you for carrying my heavy bag which this silly girl thought she was bound to convey to my cabin. It was awfully good of you!"

Harford's face became quite handsome, lit up by one of his rare smiles.

"What are we strong fellows for, if not to assist ladies? Then may I introduce myself—Bertram Harford," and, as the Major came up, "This is my friend, Major Orde, of the Bengal Lancers."

"Our names are Carlyle and O'Connor—Mrs. Carlyle and Miss O'Connor. Shall we find our deck chairs, and will you join us?"

The men accompanied them, and stood while the ladies seated themselves.

"Let's be sociable," said Mrs. Carlyle. "What will you take, Major? Milk punch? A peg?"

The Major chose the peg. "And you, Mr. Harford?"

Harford ran up his colors at once. "I am a total abstainer."

The Major looked annoyed, and Mrs. Carlyle gave him a stare, and the corners of her mouth went down.

"Oh," she said, icily; "and Angela, what for you?"

"Nothing, thanks. You know I don't take anything of the kind."

"Ah, yes, I forgot; well, you two unsociables can amuse each other."

"Will you walk, Miss O'Connor?" said Harford.

She arose from her chair, and Major Orde slipped into it, and set himself to make agreeable talk to Mrs. Carlyle, who was more to his fancy than the young, immature girl.

County Conference Generates Enthusiasm

A conference of the W. C. T. U. workers of Summit county, Ohio, proved a sentiment maker and an enthusiasm generator. Loretta Durbin, state superintendent of Flower Mission and Relief work, was the speaker. Mrs. H. H. Walters conducted the round table discussion. Similar conferences will be held all over the state while a drive is on for new members.

Fifty-two new members were reported as secured at this meeting. Mrs. Sara Lapp, county superintendent of Flower Mission and Relief work, had charge of the program and Mrs. Harry Stewart furnished the music.

Lancaster County, Nebraska, Holds All Day Program

The white ribboners of Lancaster county, Nebraska, observed January 16 by an all day program, held at the Y. M. C. A., Lincoln. From ten-thirty to twelve-thirty a prayer and praise service was conducted with a change of leaders each half hour.

During the afternoon a very profitable and practical address on "Law Enforcement" was given by Mrs. Clara C. Clayton, state vice-president. Mr. U. S. Rohrer, Federal prohibition agent for Nebraska, was present and highly complimented Mrs. Clayton's speech. According to a ruling by the Federal commissioner, he could not give an address, but answered many questions, and gave much desired information.

Rev. W. T. Elmore, pastor of the First Baptist church, and for twelve years a missionary in India, gave a fine message on "America's Obligation in Moral Leadership." Mr. Hugh LeMasters, a member of the staff of the state's attorney general, in speaking on the cigaret problem, presented many practical ideas as to the crystallization of sentiment. This was supplemented by a message from S. A. Vessey, director of the Hi-Y of Lincoln. The American Legion sent greetings by Capt. W. L. Anderson, speaker of the house of representatives. It was a day filled with inspiration.

How I Earned Extra Money at Home

—when Jim's salary was cut

By Margaret Gorman

ALL this talk of cutting wages had about as much effect on us as water on a duck's back. Jim was with a big company that would pull through hard times without cutting our income any. We felt sure of that. "And anyhow," I said one night, "how can they reduce you, when it's costing more to live than it ever did?"

The answer to that question came more unexpectedly than anything that ever happened in our lives. Jim came home the next Saturday with discouragement written all over his face. "Peggy, it's happened," he said, throwing his things down in a chair instead of hanging them up as he usually did.

"What?" I cried, trying to make him think I hadn't guessed the truth.

"My turn has come for a reduction," he said; "guess we'll have to get along with less money, or else dig into our little 'sock' at the bank."

Even though I guessed it when he came in, I just couldn't make it seem true—just when we had saved nearly enough to make the first payment on a home. Now it would gradually go for living expenses. All the evening and long into the night I kept trying to figure out what I could do to show poor old Jim that I really could help. "Certainly, there must be some way," I thought, "to keep things going without using up our savings."

The next forenoon, while dinner was cooking, I picked up the Sunday paper to try to get my mind off our trouble. The newest thing in winter clothes; a wonderful electric washing machine; the plans and pictures of the sweetest little home—all of these staring me in the face only reminded me that our little home would soon go glimmering for groceries unless I could earn some money to help buy—"Oh, Jim," I cried, suddenly, "Look!"

"You can't imagine the fun of being able to knit a sock in a few minutes. And you get paid for it generously, too!" says Mrs. Gorman.

And then I find out how to make extra money at home

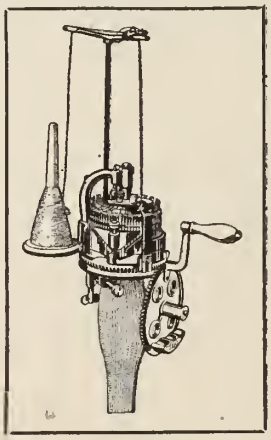
"Here it is—'How I earn money at home'—That's what I'll do. Do you think I could?"

Then we both read every word of it over together. It was the advertisement of the Home Profit Hosiery Company, Inc., of Rochester, New York. "Let's send in that coupon and get the whole story," I said. And while I was taking up dinner, Jim addressed the envelope and ran up to the corner and dropped it in the mail box.

When the answer came I found it even more interesting. Here, at last, was the way to earn money to keep our bank account where it was, and perhaps add more to it. So we sent for a machine.

To make a long story short, we never had to use a penny of the money we had saved. When the Home Profit Knitter came I did just as they told me and read the instruction book over carefully several times before I tried to work the machine. And you'll never know how hard it was for me to keep from trying it before I had learned all about how to operate it, because there was a sock already started on it. But after I had all the instructions, which are illustrated by picture and so simply explained by text, down pat, I started to do a little practice work and it wasn't long before I was knitting beautiful, warm wooly socks.

You can't imagine what fun it is to be able to really knit a sock in a few minutes until you have tried it. And the joy of being able to do it just as easily as can be, is nothing compared to your feelings when you get your first check from the Home Profit Hosiery Company for the socks you send them. A check for real money that you can use as you please.



You really work for them at a guarantee piece-work wage. They furnish you with the yarn when they send the machine. When you send them the socks you have knitted, they return an equal amount of yarn and your check by return mail, so that you don't lose a particle of time. And the remarkable part of it is that they guarantee to buy the socks, as many as you can knit, all the year around. And in addition to that they will also encourage you to make socks for your own home trade. And there's big money in that, too.

If you only knew all the little things I've been able to have that I never could have before I got my Home Profit Knitter, you would order one today. If you only knew the pleasure of at last finding a way to make money by your own fireside among the things you love best, nothing in the world would ever keep you from sending in the coupon today and finding out more about it.

Any woman in this country who wants to make money at home pleasantly, should know more about the Home Profit Knitter. So many women who don't feel that they would be successful canvassing, going from door to door taking magazine subscriptions, find the Home Profit Knitter just the thing they have been looking for to make that extra money they need, for their home or for the little ones they have.

More than once, I can tell you, I look back and wonder if I would be as happy and well as I am today, if I hadn't had my Home Profit Knitter upon which to earn the money that kept worry away. More than once, I wish I could tell every woman in this country who needs more money, the story of my experience just as I am telling it to you.

Gentlemen:

I want to thank you for your most courteous treatment accorded me on my recent visit to your plant and let you know what a pleasure it is to investigate an organization which carries out to the letter its every promise.

Your Employment Contract is very clear on what you promise to do, and, I feel, very favorable to your workers. Your guarantee to refund money if machine is not as represented is a perfectly good one in my opinion, as your machine is the most substantial I have ever seen. Your ten year guarantee against breakage, because of inferior material or poor workmanship, is very generous. In my opinion this gives your purchasers a better guarantee than usually goes with power knitting machines sold to knitting mills.

What surprised me most, however, was the simplicity with which your knitter is operated. Your instruction book must have been written by a practical expert for you will remember I took your machine and in a surprisingly short time knit a sock without help of any sort other than the book.

Let me congratulate you upon producing a hand knitting machine of such high standard.

Very cordially yours,
(Signed) OSCAR MOFFIT,
Industrial Investigator.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

SECRETARY HUGHES' CLOSING WORDS AT LAST SESSION OF CONFERENCE CHARACTERIZE ITS SPIRIT, "WHATEVER GOVERNMENTS WANT, THE PEOPLES OF THE EARTH WANT JUSTICE, PEACE AND SECURITY" —NATIONAL COUNCIL FOR REDUCTION OF ARMAMENT ANNOUNCES ITS PROGRAM

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

On Saturday, February 4, the Washington Conference on Limitation of Armament and Far Eastern questions, in the fifth plenary session exactly twelve weeks after the opening session, concluded its work with an unanimous adoption of the Far Eastern program. Mr. Hughes read the Nine-Power Treaty, "designed to stabilize conditions in the Far East, to safeguard the rights and interests of China, and to promote intercourse between China and the other powers upon the basis of equality of opportunity," and its adoption followed. The roll-call of nations confirmed the long and delicate negotiations of the various committees. It was a simple but impressive ceremony when, by a nod of the head, one power after another was pledged to respect the political and territorial integrity of China and to participate in reforms making these pledges effective.

The final speeches of the heads of delegations summarized the achievements of the Conference and a survey of the work done. Mr. Balfour characterized it as showing results far in excess of anything which experienced statesmen had hoped for.

At the sixth and final plenary session, held in beautiful Memorial Hall Monday, February 6, the formal signing of the treaties took place, after which the President of the United States addressed the assemblage.

There was the most generous applause for all the participants in the Conference. As each delegation—beginning with the American—advanced to the central table to affix their signatures to the treaties, there was applause both for the entire delegations and for the individual members. Arthur Balfour, head of the British delegation, whose work has been continuous and in the interest of harmony, was given an ovation when he first entered the hall.

President Harding's Prediction

President Harding spoke with evident feeling. He predicted that the gathering had signalized the beginning of a new era of understanding—an era in which preparedness for war would be secondary to moral preparedness for peace. With reference to the future international understanding, the President said: "I once believed in armed preparedness. I advocated it. But I have come now to believe there is a better preparedness in a public mind and a world opinion made ready to grant justice precisely as it exacts it. And justice is better served in conference of peace than in conflicts of arms."

Senator Underwood, leader of the Democratic party of the Senate and one of the four American leaders at the Conference said: "In this twentieth century, treaties have ceased to be compacts of governments, and if they are to live and survive must be the understandings of the peoples themselves."

Mr. Hughes' closing words at the last open session of the Conference were: "Whatever governments want, the peoples of the earth want justice, peace and security."

The Conference after prayer by Rev. Abernethy, adjourned sine die.

Summary of Treaties

The treaties are summarized as follows by Mrs. Thomas G. Winter, president of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, and a member of the Advisory Committee to the Washington Conference:

"A Five-Power Treaty, involving the scrapping of 68 capital ships, the restricting of the tonnage of navies, a ten-year naval holiday and the restriction of fortification in the Far East.

"A Five-Power Treaty, outlawing the use of submarines as an agency of attack on merchant ships and prohibiting the use of poison gas.

"A Nine-Power Treaty, stabilizing the conditions in the Far East, safeguarding the rights and interests of China and providing equality of opportunity—the open door.

"A Nine-Power Treaty, revising Chinese customs (a fertile cause of dispute in the Far East)

"A Four-Power Treaty, to respect each others' territory and to confer when the peace of the Pacific is threatened (abrogating the existing Anglo-Japanese treaty."

Treaties Before the Senate

The scene shifts to Capitol Hill. The fate of the Washington treaties is now with the Senate. The President, Friday, in an address made in person, placed them there. He urged ratification. Today the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations is in session considering the treaties.

National Council For Reduction of Armaments

This national Council which now has forty organizations, representing millions of men and women affiliated with it, including the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, at the beginning of its life a few months ago was christened the National Council on Limitation of Armament. It has now announced its program indicated in this quotation from the Bulletin edited by Frederick Libby, executive secretary: "First, the immediate ratification of the Conference treaties; second, a drastic reduction in the Army and Navy Appropriation Bills to a peace basis; third, the passage of a measure removing the manufacture of munitions from private control; fourth, development of the international organization of peace groups already begun with England and Japan; fifth, an intensive organization of this country through local and State Councils; sixth, an educational campaign in connection with colleges, schools, libraries and through a national speakers bureau; seventh, a legislation committee in Washington which will study all measures before Congress from the point of view of their influence for or against war."

Time To Help Has Come

"Will the Senate ratify or nullify the Conference? This question is as important to the American people who demanded the Conference as the Conference itself. If you were one of the 1,500,000 whose opinions, either by personal letter, resolutions or petition were expressed to the American delegation pledging support, now will be the time for the support to be given.

"If you are disappointed that the Conference has not brought greater reduction of armaments, that is no reason for undoing what has been achieved.

"Let your representatives in the United States Senate know that you will support them as you have supported Secretary Hughes in the completion of the task of the Conference and that you are ready for further steps in the same direction."

Mr. S E. Nicholson, the presiding clerk of the Indiana yearly meeting of Friends and for many years an officer in the Anti-Saloon League, has given up his active work with the League to join the staff of the National Council for the Reduction of Armaments.

ANTI-PROHIBITION FORCES ORGANIZED TO BREAK DOWN EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT — MAYORS OF MANY BIG CITIES TURN DOWN WINE AND BEER RESOLUTION FLOATED BY WETS

The opponents of prohibition are organized all over the United States to carry on a systematic attempt to break down the national prohibition law.

Referendums to bring pressure to bear upon Congress to modify the Volstead Act to permit traffic in wine and beer have been inaugurated in Illinois and Ohio, and are talked of in other states.

The Chicago city council has appealed to the councils of every city in the United States having a population of over 25,000 to pass a resolution similar to one passed by the Chicago "city fathers" asking Congress for a change in the Volstead Law to permit the manufacture, sale and distribution of "wholesome" beer and wine.

So-called "prominent" citizens of Chicago, New York, and other large centers have met to inaugurate a campaign, first, to obtain the repeal of the Volstead law, and finally to work for the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment.

There have been introduced in certain legislatures resolutions in favor of urging Congress to work and vote for changes in the Volstead law, for the purpose of reviving the traffic in wine and beer.

Certain metropolitan newspapers are not only openly advocating these anti-prohibition movements, but are conducting questionnaires among the citizens, which, as published in their columns, give the impression that the great majority of the people desire a return of the beer and wine trade.

There is being shown a film entitled "Results of Two Years of Prohibition," the whole purport of which is to show that prohibition has been a total failure, and a useless and unwarranted expense.

The Sanity League of America, the thirty-first anti-prohibition organization, files application for charter.

The individuals who are promoting and financing these organizations are lining up with the bootleggers and criminals who are preventing the enforcement of the prohibitory law, in certain sections of the country.

"Most of the bootleggers today are of the criminal or semi-criminal class," says a New York district attorney.

These men are found to be supplying whisky and other liquors to high school students at basket ball games; they are selling with absolute lack of conscience beverages that are rank and deadly poison. According to Chief Chemist Spear of the Internal Revenue Bureau, the customer of the bootlegger has just one chance in a hundred of getting the real thing. Federal Prohibition Commissioner Haynes says that the purchaser of this liquor is taking two chances in a hundred, for in 98 cases out of 100 he is buying poison.

Mayors Spurn Resolution

But, studying the situation, it is not as dark as it would seem to be. The resolution sent out by the Chicago city council to other large cities is not being received with enthusiasm or approval in many cases. Among the first to turn it down was Peoria, Illinois, the former liquor stronghold; Detroit, the fifth largest city of the United States, refused to consider it, and Denver opposed it by a good majority; Kansas City treated it with derision, laying it upon the table.

The mayor of San Diego, California, wrote to the city clerk of Chicago:

"I am personally and officially opposed to the sentiments expressed in the resolution. I believe that the consensus of opinion throughout the United States will be one of severe criticism against the passage of any such legislation. I believe that every effort of the United States government, as well as the state and city governments, should be directed toward the enforcement of the federal prohibition act, and the attitude of criticism directed at this one act is one that should be severely censured as tending to develop a spirit of criticism and antagonism toward the federal government."

The mayor of Portland, Oregon, advised that he was unalterably opposed to any such amendment and therefore would not present the resolution. "The people of the city of Portland and the state of Oregon have settled the prohibition question very decisively and definitely and it would be useless to make any issue of the question."

In East St. Louis, Illinois, the county W. C. T. U. passed resolutions protesting against any action being taken by the city council favoring the movement to influence Congress regarding the sale of light wine and beer, and the officers were present during the session at which the question came up. At that meeting it was unanimously voted to adopt a report of the committee of the whole declaring that it was not within the province of the city council to pass upon such a matter, since any expression on the part of the council would not necessarily represent the opinion of the people and would be of no force and effect.

The city clerk of Long Beach, California, was instructed by unanimous vote of the council to write to the Chicago authorities that "we are absolutely opposed to any modification of the Volstead Act, and if any change at all is desired, it would be our purpose that it should be strengthened and all violations of the law be severely punished."

Some of the other cities taking like action are: Everett, Washington; Grand Rapids, Kalamazoo, and Lansing, Michigan; New Orleans, Louisiana.

And it must not be thought that the citizens of Chicago are submitting without protest to this stain on the city's honor. Lengthy petitions, protesting against the city council's action in indorsing this legislation, have been filed for presentation to the council. One petition protests against the use of public funds for sending the resolution to other city councils throughout the United States. Another states that its 94 signers "protest vigorously against any modification of the prohibition laws as passed by the Congress of the United States, and call upon all officials, municipal, state and national, to honestly and conscientiously enforce these existing laws."

Rabbis Approve Unfermented Wines

Under a provision of the prohibition law, which permits the use of wines for sacramental purposes, and in accordance with the rulings of the Hebrew church in regard to their use in religious ceremonies, Jewish families have been enabled to obtain fermented wines. Complaints have been made, however, to the heads of the churches that many Jews are involved in law violations, and after an all-day discussion of the matter the United Synagogue recently recommended that measures to stop such violations be taken by the Rabbinical Assembly soon to meet. This body, an organization of the spiritual leaders of conservative synagogues in this country and Canada, took up the question in detail and official sanction for the use of unfermented wines for all religious purposes was granted. This decision will affect at least fifty thousand Jewish families.

A formal resolution was adopted decrying the necessity of using fermented wines for sacramental purposes, and a committee was appointed to confer soon with a committee of the Union Orthodox Rabbis, in an effort to reach an agreement on the subject, as the orthodox rabbis maintain that fermented wine must be used in the Jewish ceremonials.

Syracuse Veterans Oppose Any Soldiers' Bonus Raised by Tax on Wine and Beer

With but one dissenting vote, the Lighthall Post of the American Legion, Syracuse, New York, strenuously condemned the proposed return of light wines and beer under the guise of helping pay the soldiers' bonus. A resolution was passed at a recent meeting of the veterans, according to the Syracuse Post-Standard, which puts them on record as opposing any legislation having as its purpose the raising of the money in this way. Many members discussed the resolution and declared that an effort was being made to shift the wine and beer issue to the shoulders of the former service men by dangling before their eyes a means of obtaining bonus funds.

President Sees Danger in Contempt For Law

It is well known that President Harding views with great concern the tendency on the part of certain municipalities to openly flout the prohibition law.

When you find municipalities openly flouting the law an exceedingly serious question is presented to the whole country, according to the President, as quoted recently by the press. When the law is defied, popular government fails, and when it becomes impossible to enforce the law, one may well question how long our form of government may be expected to endure.

The President is studying the situation closely with the thought of evolving some policy that will stimulate better observance of the law.

THREE MILES AN HOUR!

Christine I. Tinling

Whittier came near expressing the inexpressible when he wrote his hymn about "that deep hush" divine.

"Oh, Sabbath rest by Galilee!
Oh, Calm of hills above!
Where Jesus knelt to share with Thee
The silence of eternity,
Interpreted by love."

We all need to let something of that silence into these twentieth-century, slap-dash lives of ours! It is re-creation in a literal sense to get away out of the world, far from its noise and bustle, far from trains and boats and street-cars and automobiles, where even the light rickshaw cannot travel, far from frivolity and fashion, from littleness and sham, into the vast of nature and the Real Presence behind it all.

On a cart trip in China one has this wonderful experience. Of course it is not safe to be absolutely alone, but leaving the muleteer and the trusty servant trudging along a few paces behind, one can walk on and on, hour after hour, in virtual solitude, with one's face toward the everlasting hills.

I had a solid week of cart travel, in a small congenial party, when I made my trip into southern Shansi, and then odd days of it later, alone, when moving from point to point within that province. We started morning after morning, at sunrise, and the moon would be high in the sky when we pulled into the court-yard of a village inn or a mission station. Three miles an hour, for twelve hours a day, is pretty good schedule time for this part of the world. Can it possibly pay, someone will ask, to spend so much time in reaching a few scattered places? Such doubts are entirely natural, but they are soon dissolved when one has seen what lies beyond that mountain wall.

Importance of Work in Interior

Not to go would be to miss precious opportunities. If we are really to carry our temperance message to China, we must not be content with touching the big centers on the highways of railroad and river. The great interior, too, must be reached. The ports are constantly receiving visitors, advocates of various good causes, and exponents of modern methods in religious and educational work. Sometimes, indeed, there seems to be what the French call an embarras de richesses and it is hard for the residents to make time for all the extras that demand attention. But those who live and labor far from the beaten track are apt to be neglected in a hasty visitation of a great field like this. Yet they are doing work of tremendous importance. From these hidden schools they are sending out scores of teachers and preachers to the inland provinces, strong, faithful Christian leaders. It was for the sake of reaching certain of these institutions that I took the trip across the mountains of Shansi. If I could introduce our Scientific Temperance Instruction by a week of intensive work in each school, and could leave material behind, I felt sure the missionaries would carry on the teaching from year to year.

As one does not venture on extended journeys alone, I was glad of an opportunity of traveling with some missionaries who were returning to their stations. There were four of us, two Norwegians, one Australian, and this Anglo-American mixture with the Chinese name. Foreign missionary service surely encourages cosmopolitan views. National boundaries are forgotten in a common purpose and a common task. Our long way was enlivened by the relation of experiences in more than four countries and among other things we learned how each had been led to leave the homeland for this far-off sphere.

Starting from Peking we took the railroad as far as it served us and enjoyed a night on a modern train. A sleeper over here offers even more comfort than a Pullman at home, for the separate compartments, in English style, admit of considerable privacy.

A Night in a Chinese Inn

The next night was interesting by contrast, for it afforded my first experience of a Chinese inn. As this form of domicile belongs in a class by itself it demands a brief description. Entering by the big gate we find ourselves in a large square enclosure with space for perhaps a dozen or twenty carts. Round it there runs a one-story building, divided into larger and smaller rooms, all opening directly on the court-yard. The stable occupies one corner, and the horse-troughs are in close proximity to the sleeping-quarters of the guests. It is easy to picture Joseph and Mary, finding the rooms all taken and turning to the manger close at hand.

The chief characteristics of a Chinese inn are presence of dirt and absence of furniture. The walls are probably of mud, held together by straw, and the floor consists of badly-laid bricks. Right across one side of the room there extends the kang or brick bed; it is raised some two feet from the ground and underneath it, when weather so requires, there is a fire. Half a dozen persons can easily sleep side by side on the kang so it is a decidedly economical arrangement. The sole article of furniture is a small table, but a kettle of boiling water appears to keep it company as soon as the guests arrive. Life is simple in the Orient; "man wants but little here below" savors more of truth than poetry. The windows are of paper. The servant who ushered us in, on that first night, evidently knew the peculiarity of foreigners and their partiality to oxygen, for without so much as a hint from us, he sacrificed four panes to let in the court-yard air.

Bring Your Own Bed and Board!

Old travelers know how to make themselves fairly comfortable even in a Chinese inn, and while as a new-comer my knowledge was all second-hand, nevertheless it was sufficient. I had been provided with an ample kit before leaving Peking and it was real fun to try it out. The first thing we do is to spread on the kang, by way of a carpet, our own big oil-cloth. This is supposed to ensure us a clean place to eat and sleep. We take good care not to brush against the wall and we do not on any account hang our clothes near it. We stay as near the middle as we can. Then after a picnic meal, sitting round the tiny table on our own bed-bags ,we prepared for the night. Those who have cots are very well off. The army cot, consisting of a few sticks and strips of canvas, is easily put up and easily carried, and what is more, it is really comfortable. We have our own cosy wadded quilts, and in spite of the proximity of mules and donkeys, we sleep as soundly as at home, provided we are not summoned to a midnight hunt.

Morning soon comes, for cart-travelers must make an early start. About half-past five we light the lamp that hangs against the wall, and which resembles a little black tea-pot, the spout being the outlet for the wick. Soon we have dressed, and breakfasted out of our baskets, with the help of the indispensable kettle. To pack a cart is quite an art. The heavier baggage is so placed that the mules can pull to the best advantage, the smaller pieces are then wedged together tightly enough to minimize movement, for the shaking is phenomenal. The bed-bags must be so spread as to form a comfortable resting-place; the sack of food for the animals has to be roped on behind. The three-tiered food-baskets must be reachable when we halt for the noon rest. Everything we are likely to need during the day, even including the wash-basin, is crammed into certain handy cotton bags, and these are tied to the sides or ceiling of our nondescript equipage.

Spills and Thrills

At last all is ready and off we go, with four mules to each cart and the muleteers walking beside them, wearing a small towel on the head as substitute for a hat. No marvel that we cannot go faster than three miles an hour, especially when the roads are taken into consideration. The wonder rather is that we do finally arrive. One of our carts, on a steep slope perpetrated a somersault, and its hood was in the dust and its wheels high in air! It is a mercy no one was killed. The Australian was so jammed in among the baggage that she could not be extricated until the cart had been turned over again.

Walking is preferable to that kind of riding, especially to a British constitution, and I walked miles and miles on those glorious Indian summer days. The millet was ripe, its slender stalks bowing gracefully under their burden, which may be likened to handsome tails of sable fur. The kao-liang, or "tall grain," was just ready for harvesting. It grows some seven or eight feet high, and in general appearance it resembles corn, only there is no ear. Instead, the grain stands up in a cone-shaped bunch at the very top of the plant, and, when ripe, it is a deep, rich brown. Would that one could paint those fields beneath the cloudless sky—that band of brown against the blue—the wild geese flying south in wedge formation, and the mountains, with many a sleepy hollow, bounding the horizon. Would that one might convey in such a picture some sense of the atmosphere of those perfect September days! It was a long, deep draught of joy and beauty that we quaffed during that bit of gypsy experience.

Mission Stations vs. Inns

We did not always put up at inns, never, in fact, if a mission station could be reached. Those dear missionaries, what a warm welcome they invariably gave us! How much we enjoyed all the simple comforts they had provided, the daint; home touches, the spotless guest-rooms the table-talk and the family prayers a which there was ever a fervent thanks giving for the safe journey so far.

CLEVELAND W. C. T. U. AMERICANIZATION CENTER A TRANSFORMED DANCE HALL

Residents of Cleveland who have occasion to pass Acme Hall on East Ninth Street, a foreign section of the city, look with surprise at the home-like appearance of the place. They recall that a few years ago it was a resort of very unsavory reputation, the scene of the wildest debauches of drunkenness, and lude dancing, with five bars from which flowed liquor continuously twenty-four hours a day. The tower room of Acme Hall was said to have been used for white slavery purposes, where hundreds of young girls were sacrificed to the passions of beastly men.

Today Acme Hall houses a W. C. T. U. Americanization center and the Cleveland Good Will Industries. Its entire five floors hum with helpful activities. Every morning a fifteen minute devotional service is held, which all workers in these two enterprises are asked to attend.

Previous to prohibition it was a place of wild revelries and the center of vice and lawlessness. Soon after war-time prohibition went into effect, the building was sold to the Good Will Industries, one of a chain of institutions by that name that are operated (to help people to help themselves) by collecting every conceivable thing that is not wanted, mending and fixing it up, and selling it at a small price to poor people, and the money received therefrom is used to hire unfortunate men and women, who cannot get work anywhere else, to repair other things for sale.

The W. C. T. U. has for its Americanization work two large rooms, twenty by twenty-two feet (with a large toilet room connecting), provided with heat and light without expense by the Good Will Industries. The work is co-operative. Located in the most congested foreign section in Cleveland, the opportunity for service is unlimited, and the response from the foreign mothers has been wonderful. The W. C. T. U. living room is a really home-like center, furnished with pretty rugs, chairs, tables, sofas, pictures and a victrola, with dainty curtains at the windows.

About thirty women are now coming to the center two or three times a week for lessons in English and other subjects. Mrs. Hauserman, our W. C. T. U. representative, also visits a few homes for the same purpose.

On Thursday afternoon is held the adult sewing class, and the two sewing machines owned by the center are kept busy. The women—Italians, Syrians, Slovaks and Rumanians, gypsies mostly—are learning to cut over men's trousers for the little boys, and to plan the little girl's clothes from women's dresses. It is a pleasure to behold the joy of one of them as she holds up a finished garment with the happy exclamation, "See, teacher, I feenish."

Acme Hall

But this coming together does more than show these women how to sew. It brings out the needs of the various members of the class, and enables the leaders to caution and advise, and where it is wished, to give help. That there is much need for relief may be seen by the fact that all of the people for whom the center is working are living on the bounty of the Associated Charities for food, rent, coal and gas, having been out of employment for from seven to fourteen months. The relief department of the center and the Good Will Industries are helping to keep them in clothes.

The Mothers' Party, which is held once a month, is another activity which will repay a thousand-fold for the trouble and time expended. In the future it is hoped to develop it into a real W. C. T. U., but the attempt has not yet seemed advisable. To this gathering are invited all who sew, and all who have children who attend the center. There is music, a little talk, sometimes a moving picture, and then the luncheon, which is furnished by one of the unions and served by its committee. The first party was given by the county officers, and twenty-one mothers were present, with twenty-two children, all too young to be left at home. The "American" cake which was served was one of the special attractions of the luncheon. A promise to teach a woman to make a frosted cake is worth everything.

On Saturday the children come to the center and it is expected that a Loyal Temperance Legion will soon be organized among the girls and boys who are coaxing for a club, which they seem to think is the acme of Americanism.

Three Miles An Hour!

The roughest part of the trip, but also by far the most interesting, was that which took us across the famous Ling Shih Pass which separates central from southern Shansi. One day the road lay along the Ken River, with earth-cliffs towering above us on one side and the bank dropping sheer down on the other, and often no room for another cart to pass. In these natural walls are to be seen many little niches, carved out by zealous pilgrims, with a few sticks therein, or occasionally a tablet. The travelers hope by such works of merit to secure protection for the journey. Leaving the river, we climbed up and up by the narrow rocky road. The poor mules had a hard time of it, straining, panting, sprawling on their knees, and the drivers finally had to hitch seven of them to one cart, in order to make those hills, and then send them back for the other. Very different it was for the human-kind who loved to walk. "Excelsior" expresses the impulse that seemed to thrill through body and soul. And when the top was reached, what a panorama stretched out before us! The strangeness of the loess formation gives it a fascination of its own. The mountains are cut up into terraces, perfectly flat, and one has counted from summit to base as many as thirty of these levels. Their regularity makes them positively weird, for they look like vast battlements and deserted fortresses and towers. Sometimes in a wide sweep of landscape, there is just one lonely tree poising itself at the edge of a precipice, silhouetted against the sky.

As we draw nearer we see that man has evidently wrought with nature in the carving of these mountains and the marvelously industrious Chinese have smoothed out the levels and painfully raised their crops of vegetables, almost to the very summit. We distinguish little villages, with their cave-dwellings, one above another, in the hill-side, and drab earth-houses, often dignified with arches which give a touch of elegance to the poor structure.

"Pray ye the Lord of the Harvest"

It is not a little saddening to stand on some coign of vantage looking for miles in every direction, and learn that no missionary, in all probability, has ever visited those villages of which we catch a glimpse among the mountains. Perhaps some evangelist or Bible woman has once or twice passed through, but what does that avail? What would be our condition at home, if once or twice in a lifetime someone should preach the Glad Tidings and go again and leave us in the dark? It was a joy to be able to carry with us a little literature—gospels and simple tracts—to distribute in these out-of-the-way spots, for God's word shall not return unto Him void but shall prosper in the thing whereto He sends it. We usually inquired first whether people could understand character. It is useless to ask this question of women, but a large proportion of the men reply that they can read, and sometimes they begin at once to do so. They are often eagerly receptive of the little gift. How many white ribboners, I wonder, will pray for a harvest from this seed.

As we descended on the southern side, there was one picture so characteristic of the Orient that it is printed indelibly on one's mind. We were trying our best to get to our resting-place by sunset for we had to pass what was known as a "robber village." Maybe there was no real danger, after all, but a local mandarin had just forbidden a lady missionary to travel that road without a military escort, and we were coming into the same vicinity without any such protection. Just at this juncture, a cart hove in sight from the opposite direction and there was no possibility of passing. Picture the scene if you can; the rough and narrow road, two heavily-laden hooded carts with a couple of women in

LOYAL TEMPERANCE LEGIONS IN URUGUAY'S SCHOOLS

Mrs. Carrie van Domselaar, President Liga Nacional contra el Alcoholismo of Uruguay

UNION SIGNAL readers will doubtless be interested in the activities of our Liga Nacional contra el Alcoholismo.

The executive committee and a few other faithful members, usually twelve or fourteen in number, meet regularly every Thursday in the headquarters in Montevideo to discuss business and plan the work.

Our honorary president, Mrs. Bernardina M. de De Maria being rather delicate, is not able to attend all the meetings; and Mrs. Serbino, acting president, very efficiently presides, also Mrs. de Salterain, our honorary treasurer, who is the prime mover in all our efforts.

Mrs. de De Maria formally retired from all the charitable institutions over which she presided, with the exception of the Liga Nacional contra el Alcoholismo. The societies that she had served so many years united in a great demonstration of appreciation, which was held in the large auditorium of the Atheneum. School children, prettily dressed in white, each holding a little flag, and boy scouts in uniform, lined the broad stairway to greet her entrance with temperance songs and loving speeches. She was conducted to the platform with all formality and supported there by representatives from every society. Speeches and addresses were made by the women and by ministers of state. A beautiful album containing the signatures of hundreds of her friends was presented to her, as well as many choice presents.

Drinking Fountain To Be Erected

Our Liga presented to the municipality a petition asking permission to erect, in her name, a drinking fountain in a prominent square quite near our headquarters. We hope to bring this about in 1922. We also asked to be allowed to place fountains around the city at convenient points. There are a few now, but they are of the old style with a cup. We wish to use the modern hygienic model.

The Liga has been very active in the Publishing and Poster department, translating many which come from the United States, and some from France. The leaflets are distributed not only in the city but throughout the country where we have organizations. The posters are put up in all the railway stations, as well as in the barracks where we are permitted to give temperance addresses. Mrs. Isabel Rodriguez has these in charge, a committee of ladies accompany her, and the soldiers are attentive and pleased to listen.

The superintendent of the Prison Department, Mrs. Elvira Foladori, is very active, taking a great interest in getting up little afternoon programs, visiting and talking with the prisoners, (who write her beautiful letters of appreciation for the help she renders their families in trouble) and finding employment for those who have served their time and are again at liberty. This lady was "discovered" by Miss Norville and received her appointment at her recommendation.

Mrs. Isabel Rodriguez, our organizer, lecturer, and dependable helper in every line, has organized Loyal Temperance Legions in five more public schools, and two clubs for young people. The L. T. L. is now organized in fourteen schools in and around the city, as well as in many towns of the interior. Correspondence is carried on constantly with these branches of our work, keeping them in touch with all that goes on, and supplying them with literature. Several of these smaller Ligas have organized entertainments that have been attended with every success.

We are now organizing what is called La Semana del Nino (children's week). The welfare of the child will be considered from every standpoint. There will be an exposition, or public exhibition, of everything we can gather that will be of interest. This will be on the lower floor of the Atheneum. One of the attractions will be the beautiful stereomotorgraph so kindly sent us, through Miss Norville, by the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union. It has already been greatly enjoyed. Lectures will be delivered to mothers of high and low degree, explaining the exhibits, and lectures and addresses delivered by doctors who are specialists for children.

Through the influence of the doctors who are interested in child welfare work, we have received the generous sum of $900 to defray expenses. There will be open air fetes and moving pictures, with musical program. The children of the public schools will be invited with their parents.

The Club Juventud (Y. P. B.) has undertaken to go out into the different sections, or districts, of the city giving addresses and distributing literature.

Large Field For Work Among Natives of South Africa

Dorothy Shingler
Press Superintendent East London
Y. W. C. T. U.

The thirty-second annual convention of the Cape Province W. C. T. U. was held in King William's Town. There were about fifty delegates, some of them quite young girls called the "Y's". Before the opening of the convention, a conference was held to discuss their work and to give them confidence for the activities of the coming week.

The convention was opened by our beloved president, and the mayor of King William's Town extended a hearty welcome and hoped the delegates would go away with very pleasant recollections of their visit.

Greetings were received from all over South Africa, from England, from Switzerland, also from Miss Agnes E. Slack, honorary secretary of the World's W. C. T. U.

A number of delegations were received. Perhaps the most interesting was the native women's delegation from the local W. C. T. U. They impressed one with the feeling of how much there remains for the women of South Africa to do for their black sisters, for are we not all sisters if we belong to the World's W. C. T. U.? These women sang a song in Kaffir beautifully, and presented to our president, Mrs. Sutherland, a basket of lovely flowers. "The official school syllabus (primary)", our South African president, Miss Solomon, stated, "now provides for the teaching of scientific temperance in schools," and parents are entitled to demand that their children should thus be taught.

Attention was called to the fact that members in Port Elizabeth search out all the immoral books in libraries and vulgar post-cards on bookstalls, and steps are taken to have them removed. It was recommended that when undesirable bioscopes films are shown, members should report the same to the police, and that unions should try to have a temperance film brought before the public at the local bioscopes as is now done by some unions. Raffling, and taking part in sweepstakes, should be discouraged as gambling is a growing menace to the younger generation.

It was reported by several "Y" delegates that liquor chocolates are being introduced into the country, against the law, and are being sold in cafes in the different towns. "Y"s were cautioned against these, and were advised to report their sale to the police.

A resolution was passed in favor of the reduction of armaments, because the W. C. T. U. realizes very keenly how terrible and devastating the great war has been, and the great sorrows and tribulations the women of all nations have passed through.

Very sorry we all were to bid each other adieu, after one of the most delightful events in our year's work, and one which will live forever green in the memories of all the delegates.

Prohibition Seed Sowing In Germany

Full of interest always to UNION SIGNAL readers are communications of any kind from Judge Charles A. Pollock of North Dakota, well-known prohibition champion, and a friend, tried and true, of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. The following letter to Mrs. Elizabeth P. Anderson, W. C. T. U. president of Judge Pollock's home state, and National W. C. T. U. recording secretary, tells of prohibition seed sown in Germany on the occasion of his recent visit to that country. Writing from Frankfurt am Main, he says:

What do you think of my talking prohibition to the Germans? It was a privilege to speak at a theological school, called the "Martin Mission Institute." The seventy-five student-preachers were from Germany, Switzerland, Austria-Hungary, Jugo-Slavia, Bulgaria, Esthonia, Finland and Russia.

I could not have had a better opportunity. Dr. Otto Melle, the president of the school, invited me to come. Fearing possibly he might want me to be moderate, I asked him how far I should go in presenting my message, especially regarding beer and wine. He replied "Go the whole length. I have been a total abstainer twenty years. We must raise up a band of them in our church. Urge my young preachers to become 'leaders' in this temperance reform."

He was my interpreter, so I took him at his word, and gave the strongest appeal possible both for total abstinence and prohibition.

At the morning service in the First M. E. church, the preacher urged me to talk to the children at Sunday school. There were some two hundred youngsters present.

Dr. Melle took me to an adjoining city for an evening service. We could not remain very long. He would have been glad to have me go with him to Berlin for a conference with some of the leading statesmen. He said they are all inquiring what this prohibition in America means.

After a speaking tour through Denmark, Sweden, Norway and Germany, I am satisfied that the time is ripe for active vigorous work along prohibitive lines.

BEACON LIGHTS OF PROHIBITION

Among the World's W. C. T. U. or- anizers (formerly called "round-the- orld missionaries") will probably be liss Hardynia K. Norville, fresh from er activities in South America; Miss lary Campbell, who is doing a remark- ble work in India, and Miss Christine . The Australasia W. C. T. U. is sending ts national corresponding secretary, Mrs. Annie Carvosso of Queensland.

Scotland, which has twice entertained he World's Convention, will be repre- ented by the vice-president of the na- ional organization, Mrs. Milne of Aber- leen, Miss Darling of Edinburgh, Mrs. nd Miss Gemmill of Glasgow and others.

World's W. C. T. U. Notes

The executive committee of the British Women's Temperance Association, at its December meeting at Bournemouth, England, unanimously resolved, if possible, to purchase national quarters in London as a memorial to Rosalind, Countess of Carlisle, president of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union and the British Women's Temperance Association.

Mexico is very much alive on the prohibition question, and in President Obregon and Senor Calles, Minister of the Interior, has the right kind of leaders. It is an auspicious moment for Miss Anna A. Gordon, National W. C. T. U. president, to visit Mexico, and rally the women of our sister republic to renewed activity. The W. C. T. U. has carried on a fine work in Mexico, and some of the men leaders recall with gratitude the teaching of Addie Northam Fields, who gave them the first impulse to enter the work. Miss Gordon is also to visit on her southern trip the Bahamas, and Cuba.

South Africa temperance workers are starting for the big goal of national prohibition by the local option route, and are hoping to persuade their legislators to give them a law permitting a vote on the liquor question in local units. To give them first-hand evidence of the desirability of placing a dry law on their statute books, they are inviting Mrs. Deborah Knox Livingston to speak for them this spring.

Madam Kaji Yajima, honorary president of the W. C. T. U. of Japan, was given an ovation in Honolulu, on her homeward journey. Mrs. Mary H. Whitney, president of the W. C. T. U. of Hawaii, reports the enthusiastic reception that was accorded the "first lady of the Sunrise kingdom," who said in a public address on the progress of temperance in her country, "The anti-alcohol movement in Japan is rapidly growing, just as it has ever since its organization under the inspiration of an American woman. Our women feel that temperance affects their national welfare even more than it does that of the men and they are tireless in their efforts for its success." Professor Harada of the University of Hawaii acted as Madam Yajima's interpreter.

The white ribboners of Sweden are in the midst of an educational campaign. A referendum on prohibition is to be taken during 1922. At the opening of the Swedish riksdag in January, for the first time, one woman member of the upper chamber and four women in the lower house took their places on an equal basis with the men.

"The Power House at Pathankot" by Mary J. Campbell, World's W. C. T. U. organizer, which in English has had such wide popularity in India and other English speaking countries has been translated into Urdu.

New Zealand is preparing for another prohibition campaign, the vote to be taken in December, 1922. They expect to have the assistance in this latest of many battles of Mrs. Mary Harris Armor, that redoubtable evangel of righteousness, and hope she may convince the voters to vote for prohibition because of what it has achieved in the United States.

U. S. A. methods are being adopted by the W. C. T. U. workers in Belgium to raise funds for the cause. Mrs. Elizabeth Jacqmain writes, "We have written the Commune to give us a standing place at the market for the sale of 'white ribbon doughnuts' to replenish our W. C. T. U.. treasury." She continues, "The union met at my home recently, and we hemmed fourteen dinner napkins for a maternity ward of a hospital, to be wrapped in white tissue paper with Cora Stoddard's leaflet, on 'prenatal effects of alcohol when taken by the mother.'" The white ribboners of Brussels arranged a deputation to wait on the head of the schools to ask permission for physicians to lecture on scientific temperance, with lantern slide illustrations.

The educational department of Burma is giving a grant toward the traveling expenses of the W. C. T. U. secretary for scientific temperance lectures in different parts of that country. Tracts in Burmese, Karen, Tamil, Telegu and English are distributed.

The government of Ceylon gives a grant of 200 rupees a month toward the white ribbon substitute for taverns. Arrangements are being made for a W. C. T. U. refreshment booth at the All-Ceylon Exhibition in March. Fourteen Loyal Temperance Legions have been organized in Colombo.

"We have had a very good convention and are rejoicing over Bishop Fyffe of the Anglican Church signifying his willingness, in his capacity of chairman of the Burma Representative Council of Missions, to sign a protest prepared by the W. C. T. U. against a public bar at the Burmese regatta and sports on the occasion of the visit of His Royal Highness, the Prince of Wales," writes May Mack from Rangoon, Burma.

Mrs. Ella A. Boole, national vice-president-at-large, spent a day last week at National W. C. T. U. headquarters, in conference with her co-officers.

Mrs. Maude B. Perkins, national Y. P. B. secretary, was a visitor at National W. C. T. U. headquarters for a few hours, last Wednesday. Mrs. Perkins is on her way to attend sectional meetings to be held in Iowa, Nebraska, Colorado, Wyoming, Utah, Idaho, Oregon, Washington, Montana and North Dakota.

Our Law Observance Window Card

The "star in the window" grows in popularity. Orders from every part of the country continue to pour in. Its success was assured when some of the wets of St. Louis, so it is reported, threatened to smash every window in which it was displayed.

"There is a commendable spirit behind the scheme," says the Passaic (N. J.) Herald. "It is time that our citizens were reminded in a striking way that it is unpatriotic to violate the law, even though they do not approve of it, and that it is not consistent with Americanism to show contempt for the Constitution any more than it is to show contempt for the flag."

Prominent Newspapers Change Attitude

The newspapers both reflect and make public sentiment. It is one of the encouraging signs of the present period that such papers as the Los Angeles Times in the West and the Boston Herald in the East have come out strongly for the Eighteenth Amendment and for a strict enforcement of the Volstead Law.

NATIONAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION, ATLANTIC CITY, NEW JERSEY, NOVEMBER 18-23, 1922

The Boston Transcript, too, which has been a severe critic of prohibition, has recently given much space to quotations in favor of the dry policy. The New York Times, which has been an outspoken opponent of prohibition, the other day went out of its way to commend editorially certain statements made by an English visitor, Mr. Wilson, in favor of prohibition. To the consternation of the "antis" and the gratification of the drys, the Times said:

"Mr. Wilson is not very distant from the dividing line of accuracy when he tells those who commissioned him that prohibition is firmly founded on the wishes and the determination of a large majority of our people, that it has come to stay, and that it is not a failure except in the sense that all laws are failures—it does not command observance from everybody. The violations, he admits, are many, but he emphasizes the enormous decrease in the amount of alcohol consumed in 1921 as compared with two years ago, and he figures out how small is the allowance of liquor that the bootleggers, smugglers and moonshiners together can provide for a population as large as that of the United States."

The action of these metropolitan newspapers in coming out for law and its enforcement should receive commendation from lovers of good government, and be brought to the attention of other papers in the hope that they will follow suit.

Cold Water Thrown on Wine and Beer

The scheme of the Chicago City Council to have its wine and beer resolution adopted by the "city fathers" of communities of 25,000 and over, is calling forth some excellent publicity for the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Law. Many mayors are not only refusing to present the resolution and censuring severely the proposition, but are taking occasion to express their convictions in strong language that prohibition is a blessing to the community and has come to stay.

Every local union will of course do everything in its power to see that its city takes the right attitude on this question, if the resolution is presented to its council for passage.

"Be a Pal to Your Child"

"You W. C. T. U. women are on the right track," said the city official when he discovered that the two women to whom he had been showing his department were white ribboners. "In your care for the children of the country you are beginning where all reforms should begin. The adults will often go on just as they have started, and while you are endeavoring to reclaim one person who is already entrenched in evil habits, you can start a good many little folks on the right road away from temptation."

"But then," he went on reflectively, "it's true that you do need to spend considerable effort in cleaning up the places where the trouble begins. I'm thinking now of the dreadful murder of those young people not long ago, which evidently resulted from cabarets as well as booze. Such places must be cleaned up before a town is safe for the young. If you could get the necessary money, it would be worth your while to hire a keen lawyer to attend every trial of a boy or a girl who has gone wrong, see in what sort of place the wrong was first started, and then, for the sake of other boys and girls, demand that the authorities close that place—demand it in the name of the W. C. T. U. If you're not afraid to meet evil with a strong hand, you're sure to win."

"I should like to send a message to all the fathers and mothers of the land. In the course of my official and unofficial life I have had so much experience in dealing with these young people, and have seen so many of the dangers surrounding them, that I wish I had a voice which would reach to every parent. I would say: 'Be a pal to your child. Be sure you start him right, and keep his full confidence. Don't let anything stand between you.'"

Can the importance of starting the child right be over-estimated? Not if a statement is true which recently was made by Dr. Maximilian P. E. Groszmann—educational director of the Society for the Study and Training of Exceptional Children—in an address before a group of workers in Philadelphia:

"When the problem of the mal-adjusted child is solved, there will be no criminal court. All criminality has its roots in childhood. A criminal career starts in youth. Children are subject to emotions and impulses which are not understood by their parents or their teachers, and thus their inclinations towards crime take root and develop."

The speaker told of the effect of heredity and environment, and suggested that the "thrills" which children obtain by getting into mischief could be gained by methods which would educate and develop if those associated with them were really desirous of furthering their highest good.

This is the constructive work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and whatever else we may be accomplishing, unless in each community we are helping to push the Child Welfare department, and the Loyal Temperance Legion, we are failing in some of our most important aims. As an organization and as individuals we must "be a pal to the child."

"Beer Is a Medicine" Myth Exploded

The result of the recent questionnaire by the American Medical Association must be a comfort to those tender-hearted individuals who insisted that the passage of the Willis-Campbell bill was imposing a terrible hardship upon the sick who were thereby deprived of their "medical beer."

The physicians of the country, by a vote of three to one, have relieved the fears of these over-solicitous friends of the beer drinker, by declaring that beer has no value as a medicine. Not a single state of the Union gave a majority for the brewer's product.

"The Liquor Pig"

The truth lying back of many press reports is humorously suggested by the Australian Patriot. This paper reminds its readers that the "liquor pig" in the U. S. A., trying to push its nose under the prohibition gate, is squealing because it cannot get through, and that "the funny thing is that when these squeals are echoed through the press, some folks believe that there is no prohibition gate at all," whereas, "if there were no gate there would be no squeal."

In certain of the critical points where the prohibition fight is the hottest, even some of its staunch defenders are greatly discouraged as they read the repeated statements—"Prohibition does not prohibit," "The Eighteenth Amendment is promoting lawlessness," and the like. There is a great difference between overconfidence, which often brings defeat because of lack of preparation and underestimation of the power of the enemy, and the cool calm of the soldier who follows out the command, "Trust in God and keep your powder dry."

You cannot enforce prohibition by saying that it cannot be enforced. If you will glance through your history you will see that in all times the great generals, from Caesar to Foch, never allowed the possibility of defeat to enter their own or their soldiers' thought. Realizing the gravity of the situation, and making all possible preparation for the conflict, they kept up the spirits of all with the slogan, "We shall win." It was one of the secrets of victory.

The fact that law violations are reported in the press is a proof that they are news, that the liquor element are endeavoring to multiply and magnify them to discount the results of prohibition, and that prohibition does prohibit—that is why it hurts!

Other Countries on Prohibition In the United States

"I'm a business man, and the casual remarks of other business men that I met proved to me that the abolition of liquor in America has resulted in general increased efficiency in trading and a gain of new business, the result of much capital being diverted from the liquor channel into legitimate business channels."

This is the statement of a prominent business man in Brisbane, Australia, on his return recently from a world tour in the interest of his firm, during which he visited Canada and the United States. "Nor did I see any drunks during my tour in the states. Nor did I come into contact with illicit liquor selling," he told the representatives of The Queensland Prohibitionist from which we have quoted.

Grit, another Australian paper, quotes Miss Dorothea Spinney, the famous interpreter of the Greek drama, who has travelled in many lands, in her conversation with a reporter who asked her what she had to say about "dry America." "Prohibition has worked wonders in that great country," she said. "Why, you can see the difference on the faces of the people, the porters on the trains, and, yes, you can actually smell the difference." She went on to tell how, before prohibition days, she used to arrive at a town and on the way to the hotel "guess" whether it was legally wet or dry—"and we never had any difficulty in guessing correctly." Because she saw what had been gained in America Miss Spinney urged the temperance forces in Australia to push toward the same goal, stating that the leaders would "do more lasting good for Australia when they have won and Australia has been dry twelve months than all the politicians have done in fifty years."

That successful prohibition in America will bring prohibition in other countries is a fact universally recognized—by liquor interests as well as the dry forces. The Indian Witness quotes Dnyanodaya, a prominent native worker, as saying, "If India is to take her proper place among the nations, she must resolve to imitate the example of the United States and free herself from the curse which has wrought such havoc in every land. With this end in view we hope that India will soon get local option, which means the power to decide for herself."

One of the most interesting articles on the subject is one entitled "American Prohibition As I Saw It" by Richard McGhee in The Alliance News and Temperance Reformer of London. The writer has been in America nine times, the first time in 1886, when he was almost "convinced that the liquor traffic was the predominant partner in the two great political parties that ruled the United States,"; again in 1909, when he saw President Taft address the great "bread line" near Wall Street (which has been dropped since the coming of prohibition); and the last time, last summer, when only once in a stay of eight weeks, was seen any sign of intoxicants. We will let him tell the story: "That was in a case where my host was under the impression that being an Irishman, it would be to me a terrible deprivation to be compelled to take dinner without a little Irish whisky, and so my friend in his generosity went to great trouble and great expense to secure me a little. I alone was to be supplied with it at the dinner, although over fifty persons were present. It was quite a surprise to my friend to find that I did not indulge in whisky, and it was then that he told me how much trouble he had been to to get me the small bottle which he had provided. Not in another instance during my eight weeks in America did I see drink."

Mr. S. K. Ratcliffe, a British journalist, living in the United States as American correspondent for the Manchester Guardian, reminds his British readers that the United States does not stand alone, but that "the suppression of the liquor traffic has become, or is becoming, the policy of the great majority of the English-speaking peoples throughout the world." He complains that the British are making no serious effort to learn the truth concerning the "momentous movement which is changing the entire civilization of the 'West'" and are being misled in regard to it. His suggestion is that a full, authoritative, scientific inquiry should be made, with the co-operation of the Ministry of Health, the medical association, and the national scientific societies for this purpose. "There is not a competent observer in the United States," says Mr. Ratcliffe, "who does not know that the liquor traffic and the liquor interests as a power in American public life have been uprooted and destroyed."

If we in the United States needed encouragement to keep on until we had not only put out the liquor traffic, but had closed and locked the doors after it, it would surely be furnished by the knowledge of the way we are being watched by other nations, who are bound to follow our example sooner or later, if we "stand fast."

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awak'ning continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

Sayings of Frances E. Willard

Moral horticulture is more to a boy than all the classics and mathematics ever thrust upon his mental palate; instruction in the daily bread of Christian ethics inculcated as a theory and illustrated as an art would be to him the bread of life.

* * * *

We have the power of discrimination and judgment in a far higher degree than we have the good will to exercise it. If we would but cultivate the habit of putting ourselves in another's place by an effort of Christian imagination, that angel of the mind, our judgment, would not so heavily condemn the professions made in our hymns and prayers.

* * * *

The only solvent for the silicate of human pride and stubbornness and sin is love. It conquers all things. May we be panoplied and made invincible by this omnipotent quality of soul, and whatever we forget may the Holy Spirit burn into our memories and lives this supreme truth that "there is nothing inexorable but love."

* * * *

Let us be great-hearted, royal-natured, superior to all pettiness and narrowness, patient and steadfast—for this we all may be.

IN HIS STRENGTH

(The Pledge of an Honorary Member.)
Thomas O. Blair,

When I am weak, then am I strong.—Paul.

A thousand easier things to do
Than fight for the W. C. T. U.!
But I wear your sign that the world may see;
And I flash you the signal: "Pray for me."

Tho I speak but a little word of cheer,
That thrills with hope that the King is near,
The King will take up the word that I say,
And speed the glad message on its way.

Then here is the word I would pass along:
We all are weak, but the King is strong;
I've puzzled long, and have found, at length,
To His weakest ones He gives most strength.

Tho the fight be fierce, and the way seem long,
We are sure to win; for the King is strong.
So here's my pledge, that the fight begun
Shall have my sword till the field is won.

Parliamentary Usage

Mrs. I. W. Gleason
National Superintendent

Dear Members of Local Unions and Parliamentary Superintendents: Your national superintendent has sent to each state superintendent, parliamentary Plans of Work for every union. Be sure that each gets these and has them read that it may know just what to work for.

Dear State Presidents: If your state has a new Parliamentary superintendent, will you please send me her name, if you have not already done so, or if you have no superintendent, will you please "elect" one as soon as possible. No state can afford to be without a superintendent of this important department at this time when it is so very necessary that our women be trained for better American citizenship, and I know of no better way to train them than by getting them to take a thorough course in Parliamentary Law.

Let every union begin study at once, for time is passing very rapidly, and soon conventions will be here, and then —what about reports? Don't let it be said—"It might have been."

It is my hope that—

Every union will elect a Parliamentary superintendent

Every union will own at least one "Gleason's Parliamentary Digest"

Every union will study the lessons as outlined in the national plan of work.

Every union will hold a parliamentary contest

Every union will send a winning contestant to the county convention, who will then be sent to the state convention to take part in the state parliamentary contest, and the winner at state contest be sent to the national convention, where we hope to hold a national Parliamentary contest in an adjoining room, if not as a part of the convention itself.

Dear members all, won't you help me to hold a national Parliamentary contest by sending a winning contestant from your local union to the county convention?

Each local union is a part of the great whole, and there can be no national contest unless the local, county and state all do their part toward making the national contest possible.

Remember, all you have to study in order to enter the contest are the first nine lessons as outlined on page 165 of the "Digest."

Would it not be "just fine" if your union should WIN in the contest at the national convention? Won't you begin work to make the national contest a reality?

If members do not wish to purchase the complete "Digest," they may get Booklets No. 1 and No. 2. These cover the lessons required to enter the contest; but the leader should have a "Digest," as the lessons are outlined there.

Be sure to urge pupils to study their lessons at home, or before coming to the class, or the union meeting, for in that way they will reap much benefit; we invariably reap what we sow, and if we do not sow, we shall not reap.

"All together" for an alert Parliamentary superintendent, a Parliamentary class, Parliamentary "Digest," Parliamentary study—and then—a Parliamentary contest.

If you have a good leader, just watch the interest and your membership increase, and if you are in real earnest, you can help greatly towards our goal, "A Million Members" and "Law Enforcement."

Parliamentary principles, if applied, mean the practice of the Golden Rule.

Sixteenth Quadrennial Convention of the Reorganized International Sunday School Association

Mrs. Stella B. Irvine

The official call for the quadrennial convention of the Reorganized International Sunday School Association to be held in Kansas City, Missouri, June 21-27, (both dates included) 1922, has been made by the executive committee.

The call voices the need of the assembling together of Sunday School forces of North America in these days when disturbed conditions throughout the world and the marked tendency toward the lowering of the general morale are matters of great concern among world leaders.

"The only remedy for these disturbing conditions is the never failing panacea for all the ills of the world and life, namely, the religion of our Lord Jesus Christ. Nothing else will save the day nor save the world."

The great International Sunday School Association recognizes its supreme opportunity of Christianizing the rising generation of this continent, thus helping to make a Christian world. This convention will afford an opportunity "to give to the Sunday School the recognition it deserves as a religious force, and as a builder of Christian Citizenship, which is the salvation of any nation."

The Kansas City convention will be a Jubilee convention, celebrating the effort to bring together in one organic body, all of the Sunday School forces of America, particularly the Sunday School Council of Evangelical Denominations and the International Sunday School Association, for the purpose of carrying forward community Sunday School work and religious education.

The program of the convention includes a series of institutes on the method and program of daily vacation Bible Schools and week day Schools of Religion. The Sunday School department of the W. C. T. U. sees in these new Sunday School movements a rare field for the promotion of our principles, particularly along the lines of temperance, law enforcement and Christian citizenship. We urge the attendance of many white ribbon Sunday School workers and believe they will be given a vision of our new opportunities. Our national president will doubtless attend as will your national superintendent.

The convention is a delegated one and our workers will need to register from their respective Sunday Schools. For information address respectively the general secretary of the State Sunday School Association.

Knowledge Is Power

Helen G. H. Estelle, National Superintendent Anti-Narcotics

In every state of our union there is a law regulating the sale of drugs and tobacco products. By a vast majority of people, these laws are not known and many storekeepers violate them innocently. In order to make possible a study of the tobacco laws of the state, this department advocated a "Law Posting Day" when an effort should be made by every local Woman's Christian Temperance Union, every Young People's Branch, and all who are interested in this phase of our educational work, to have a copy of the state law left in every place where tobacco products are sold, to also give one to all the school teachers, and have it placed in all public buildings.

The response to this plan has been most hearty. Some of the state superintendents have stimulated a rivalry among their county and local workers by offering a slight reward to the superintendent or member who places the greatest number of copies.

Law Posting Day will be observed as follows:

Pennsylvania—May 17.
Indiana—February 22.
Kansas—February 22.
New Hampshire—March 20.
Illinois—April.
California (South)—March.
Nebraska—March 4.
New York—February 15.
North Carolina—February 10.
Wisconsin—May 1.
Connecticut — Following Anti-Cigaret Day.

May none of the sellers of tobacco in your state say, when arrested for law violation: "I did not know the law."

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

When George Washington Prayed

Down in Wall Street, in front of the old Subtreasury building, is the bas-relief of a man kneeling in prayer. His time was one of fear and darkness. The cause to which he had dedicated his life, for which he had already led brave men to death, and in which rested now the hopes of freedom for all the years, was sinking fast into the night of irretrievable disaster. Burdens too heavy to be borne rested upon his shoulders; appalling responsibilities overwhelmed his soul.

But he did not resign; he did not withdraw. For a moment he did not go forward. It was very dark. The way had eluded him; and so he stopped, and looked up, and set his course again by the great Light. Of George Washington, kneeling in the snow at Valley Forge, Joaquin Miller could have sung as he did sing of Columbus on the deck of the Santa Maria:

"Then pale and worn he kept his deck,
And peered through darkness. Ah, that night
Of all dark nights!
And then a speck—
A light! A light! A light! A light!
It grew, a starlit flag unfurled!
It grew to be Time's burst of dawn.
He gained a world; he gave that world
Its grandest lesson, 'On! sail on!'"

—Daniel A. Poling in Christian Endeavor World.

Courageous Audacity of Prohibition Champion

Professor Jean Appleton, College of Law, University of Lyons, France, caused a sensation at the formal ceremonies of opening the college year, says the Intercollegiate News Service. At this ceremony (which is comparable only to the installation of a university president in this country) Professor Appleton, orator of the day, astounded his colleagues and the many dignitaries present by taking for his subject, "American Prohibition and its Results." Prof. Appleton, who has not been a temperance or prohibition advocate, told of his three visits to the United States, one before and two after prohibition, and of what he saw. He declared prohibition to be a success and urged France to imitate the United States, at least in restriction of alcohol. One newspaper, speaking of the speech, said that no one but a native of Lyons could appreciate the audacity of it, for Lyons is the center of the wine industry of France. The Lyons press spoke highly of the speaker and of his oratory, but sarcastically of his remarks.

Students at the University of Brussels, Belgium, have formed groups for the study of alcoholism as a social problem under the direction of Le Mouvement Estudiantin pour la Culture Morale and with the co-operation of the organized student body, l'Association Generale des Estudiants. Professor Jules Bordet of the Institute Pasteur and winner of the Nobel Prize in 1921, is giving a series of university lectures on alcoholism.

Y. P. B. Holds Progressive Missionary Meeting

The East Syracuse (N. Y.) Branch is the originator of a plan for a progressive missionary meeting, and demonstrated its success at the regular December meeting. The different homes visited represented China, Burma and South America, countries where our Y. P. B. missionaries are at work. In each place the decorations, refreshments and program were typical of the country. When China was visited, real Chinese tea was served, a gift of Roger Wang, brother of our Frances Willard Wang. The speakers, dressed in native costumes, presented their part of the program. Extracts from letters of May Mack, Frances Willard Wang and Muriel Ayres, together with articles found in THE UNION SIGNAL, furnished ample material for a fine program. The last place visited represented the United States. Ice cream and cake were served, significant of the many saloons that have recently been turned into ice cream parlors. The program presented from many different points of view the actual results of prohibition in the United States.

Tickets were sold for the entire trip, but, if preferred, an offering can be taken at each station, and a substantial amount in this way raised for the Y. P. B. Missionary Fund.

The Englewood (Ill.) high school is to make of its new auditorium a "hall of fame," says the Chicago School Journal. Upon four large plaques will be placed portraits of a great reformer, a great inventor, a great statesman and a great scientist. The school has chosen for these places of honor Frances E. Willard, Thomas Edison, Theodore Roosevelt, and Albert A. Michelson.

Abraham Lincoln's "First Temperance Lecture"

Stories of Abraham Lincoln's young manhood are numerous but one not often related is found in a new book, "Lincoln and Prohibition" by Charles T. White. He credits it to Robert H. Browne, who knew the Great Emancipator in Springfield.

The incident happened about 1836 at a gathering of the neighborhood and village, where they were building a new bridge. When the hard work was over there was a feast, merry-making, trials of strength, and other sports, including much liquor drinking, raw whisky was sold at fifteen cents a gallon, and on this occasion there was a barrel of it. In the feats of strength a large man named "Sam", the champion heavy-weight lifter, with difficulty raised six inches off a platform a pile of wood weighing one thousand pounds. The spectators, knowing Abraham Lincoln's prowess as an athlete, at once demanded that he also try lifting the pile of wood. Lincoln was reluctant to enter the exhibition, but finally assented, and lifted the load clear a foot from the platform "without any straining." Some of Sam's friends shouted, "Do it again; we didn't see it!" Mr. Lincoln, to satisfy these, stepped on the platform again, saying as he did so, "Sam, sit down on the top of the pile." With Sam on top of the pile, Lincoln raised the big load almost as easily as he did the first time.

Then the bung was knocked out of the barrel of whisky. Lincoln, being challenged again, took hold of it by the chimes, raised it from the ground, took a mouthful of liquor from the open bunghole, turned his head to the right, and spat it out on the ground over his shoulder. On releasing the barrel, he said in substance, just as he related it years afterward when invited to drink, as he often was:

"My friends, you will do well and the best you can with it, to empty this barrel of liquor on the ground, as I threw the little part of it out of my mouth. It is not on moral grounds alone that I am giving you this advice; but you are a strong, healthy and rugged people. It is as true as that you are so now, that you cannot remain so if you indulge your appetites in alcoholic drinks. You cannot retain your health and strength if you continue the habit, and when you lose them, neither you nor your children are likely to regain them. As a good friend, without counting the distress and wreckage of mind, let me advise that if you wish to remain healthy and strong, you will turn liquor away from your lips."

Some years ago an American, being asked to bound the United States, made the familiar reply: "The United States are bounded on the north by the Aurora Borealis; on the east by the rising sun; on the south by the South Pole; on the west by the Day of Judgment."

State of Oaxaca Opens War On Booze

"The state of Oaxaca, Mexico, is determined to establish prohibition," says the Chicago Tribune in a recent edition.

"Its first move was to tax all alcoholic liquors from 50 to 200 per cent. Monthly licenses have been raised from 30 to 1,000 pesos (a peso is worth about 50 cents) plus a 2 per cent treasury tax on all sales.

"The heaviest blow was a law requiring all liquor selling places to be separated from all other businesses. Now saloons are attached to grocery stores and restaurants. In future they must bear a sign in red letters 'Tavern'."

Three Miles an Hour

each, then this third one, blocking up the way, its four mules hopelessly facing our front quartette. On the left a steep cliff towers above us; on the right is a bluff over which there suddenly scampers a flock of black goats and white lambs, being taken home for the night out of the way of wolves. The next moment they and their shepherd have disappeared and we are left there in the road; we cannot budge.

The muleteers are silent, impassive, obstinate. They take out their long pipes, squat on their heels in the thick dust, and smoke. Each seems to be saying to the other, "Time is of no consequence to me; when you get out of my way I shall proceed." We women conclude that robbers or no robbers, we may have to spend the night in this spot. The sun is setting behind the distant peaks; the landscape is touched with a golden glory. And now there falls on the ear a sound of bells, a gentle tinkling drawing slowly nearer. Along the narrow footpath just above us comes a line of camels, some forty of them, each laden with two large bales of cotton. With a solemn and superior air they march past, every single nose of them wearing the same snarl of contempt for us poor helpless mortals, stuck there in the road. We allow things to take their natural course, remembering that this is the Orient, and not wishing to share the fate of Kipling's "fool, who tried to hustle the East." And we are rewarded, for the proverbial middle-man finally interferes. He suggests that there is nothing to quarrel about, and a way must be found out of the difficulty. The other party are persuaded to put their pride in their pockets and literally "back down," for it is only logical that one cart should retrace its way rather than two, and four mules rather than eight.

But darkness found us on the trail on that occasion and we had to pass through a long and narrow gorge, which was so rough that one wondered how any cart could survive such racking. Why did it not all go to pieces at once, like the far-famed One Hoss Shay? Never in the worst storm at sea, when I have had to brace against the berth's edge, to keep from being thrown to the floor, have I experienced anything to compare with this.

Such is cart travel in the mountains of Shansi. I took the long trip direct to my farthest point, because it was possible to have company for the whole distance, and on the return journey I could work my way back by easy stages, if necessary, without such help. Hung Tung was the goal. Here the China Inland Mission has a Boys' School. A really fine plant is in course of erection, being the gift of a friend of missions in America. The school buildings so far completed, with the handsome tower, stand out as one of the chief features of the landscape, just beyond the city wall. They are all of grey brick, with the Chinese fish-tail roofs and elegant arched colonnades, a most attractive group already, and promising to be even more so in the near future. The bricks are made on the premises in three large kilns; so also is the decorative moulding and most of the furniture. It is a wonderful triumph to have accomplished such things in the interior.

We record here the names of friends and comrades who have recently passed to the higher life:

MRS. THERA B. TRUE, at her home in Edgewood, Iowa. For thirty-eight years a devoted consecrated worker in the W. C. T. U., Mrs. True served as president of the local union, nine years as secretary, and ten years as district president, besides holding county offices of various kinds. A beautiful influence in the home, church and community, she will be sorely missed.

MRS. LIZZIE A. HAWLEY, of Gardner, Illinois, for over thirty years identified with W. C. T. U. activities; president of the local and vice-president of the county union; at one time county president. Her fine qualities endeared her to all with whom she came in contact, and her loss will be felt not only by her white ribbon comrades, but by the community as well.

MRS. LOUISE T. BUTLER, president of the Longmont (Col.) W. C. T. U., an office which she filled for sixteen years; had served also as district president, member state appropriation committee and board of directors, but her interest included the world, and her influence was far-reaching. The memory of her rare, sweet and strong personality and unswerving loyalty to the cause and leaders, is a benediction to the organization.

MRS. MARY C. MILLER, aged 86 years, charter member of the Amboy (Ill.) W. C. T. U. and corresponding secretary for Lee county. A saintly character, a conscientious citizen, a power for good in the community.

Articles of Interest in Current Periodicals

"The Woman's Own Job—the Child," an editorial by Ida Clyde Clarke in the Pictorial Review for February.

"We know that woman's sphere is the home. We have learned that the sanctity and safety and comfort and joyousness of the home depend to a great degree on outside influences—upon such things as laws concerning sanitation, food, schools, property rights, marriage, divorce, the rights of the child, and all of those distinctly human problems upon which the quality and stability of the home depends."

"Making Over Mothers, a Topic of Timely Interest," by Ellsabeth Sears, in the Pictorial Review for February.

"Bats in the Belfry," an editorial in the Saturday Evening Post for January 28.

"The greatest good that can come out of the Washington conference is not the limitation of armaments, important though that is, but limitation of the thought of war. In proportion as the world thinks less of war it will build fewer battleships."

"The Dawn of a New Day" by Harvey W. Wiley, M. D., "Letters from a Senator's Wife, by Mrs. Frances Parkinson Keyes, and "The Open Channel" by Anne Shannon Monroe, in February Good Housekeeping.

"Food for Thought is Still on the Free List," by Dorothy Canfield, and "Selling Good Health to York," by Anna Steese Richardson, in the Woman's Home Companion for February.

"Twain," an editorial, and "How We Neglect Our Schools," by Charles A. Selden, in February Ladies' Home Journal.

"What Are We Doing with Our Children; The Old-Fashioned Mother and the New-Fashioned Daughter," by Beatrice Barmley, in February Ladies' Home Journal.

"Searching your consciences, mothers, do you not agree that we are counting as too important the material welfare of our children, spending money lavishly on their pleasures, clothes, food, education, but neglecting to too great an extent the importance of character, discipline, self-control, endurance—those Spartan things which harden and fit for life?

"It is so much easier to give the child self-expression than to give it self-control, consideration, habits of economy; so much easier to hand out a dime or a quarter for movies, sodas, candy, than to train our children that luxuries must be used sparingly.

"I am going to pull myself up with a firm hand, spend more time on character building, search those old experiences for moral backbone and a sense of values that will enable me to help my Julia towards realizing that fine ideal. It won't be nearly as comfortable, but I'm going to shut my teeth till the end is attained."

"No Child Is Really Bad," by Angelo Patre, and "The Story of My Life," by Mme. Marie Curie, in The Delineator for March.

"Are There Any Lincolns Today?" by A. B. Farquhar, in Collier's for February 11.

Robbing on Shares

There is nothing new in the plan to increase the federal revenues from a tax on beer and wine. It has been proposed before, admittedly as an attack upon the law. It is a specious appeal, though plausible, despite the fact that it has been proved, not only in the United States, but elsewhere, that revenue derived from such a source constitutes a liability rather than an asset, because the economic cost of producing the revenue is far greater than the claimed net return. In practice, the system is about as profitable to a nation or a community as it would be to an individual to permit a highwayman to rob him on shares. An estimated net return, say of $500,000,000 annually, the amount proposed by Secretary Mellon as desirable to meet the proposed bonus, would cost the people of the United States many times that sum, spent for something they do not want, something they have learned to do quite well without.—Christian Science Monitor.

The Enemy

Frances S. Hallowes

(The ship "Persia" has just left Marseilles for India, having among its passengers Major Orde and Bertram Harford. The latter, on his way to fill a Civil Service appointment, is a total abstainer, and is much pleased to note that Angela O'Connor, a young girl to whom he has been of assistance as she was struggling up the companionway with a heavy bag, refuses wine at dinner. Later Mrs. Carlyle, with whom Angela is travelling, suggests drinks. Harford and Angela decline, and are dubbed "unsociables." They start for a stroll along the deck).

CHAPTER II.

THE night was hot and dark. There was no moon; a thunder-cloud hid every bright star. "I hope you do not object to being bracketed with me," Harford asked of the girl who was silently walking at his side.

"Bracketed? Oh, forgive me, but my thoughts were far away, and I did not quite hear what you said."

"Bracketed as unsociable."

"Oh, because we neither of us drink whisky-pegs." She laughed merrily.

"Are you an abstainer?" he asked.

"Do you mean, have I signed the pledge? No, but I never take wine or whisky; my mother brought me up without it. She says it is bad for our complexions; she never drinks any, and she is strong and beautiful. You could not imagine my dear mother; she is the loveliest woman in the world; so young to have a big daughter like me!"

Tears came into her voice.

"You have just left her," said Harford, sympathetically.

"Yes, I have never been away from her before."

Harford led her on to talk of her past, divining that it would comfort her, and he longed to hear more about this girl. She seemed to float by his side in the dim light. Her slender, graceful figure in the soft white gown, with the crown of waving hair, looked almost angelic.

"A good name for her, 'Angela,'" he said to himself.

She seemed to be conscious of his sympathy, and she told him much of her past life in her innocent, girlish way.

"My father died when I was small, I can't remember him at all; he was ill and away, mother said, and she does not like to speak of him. I have been my mother's pet and companion all my life; I have never been to school or college; mother could not spare me, so I had a governess and master at home. We live in Derbyshire and, oh! I have lots of friends there among the poor people. Do you know Bakewell? Our home is near there: such a lovely place."

"Yes, I know it, but not well, only as a tourist," he replied.

"Oh, then you can't know the prettiest places: all the lovely little crystal streams where the trout are, and the lily woods and pheasant covers. Oh, how I shall miss them! But I have been talking all the time, now it is your turn, Mr. Harford."

He told her that he was an orphan, brought up by two aunts; that he had passed his examination for the Civil Service, and was going to India, in preference to staying in England.

A swish of silk behind Angela, and a voice said, "It is time to go to bed."

"Good-night, Mr. Harford." She held out a slender hand and pressed his gently. Mrs. Carlyle bowed slightly.

The deck was nearly empty, but Harford seated himself and went off into a reverie, oblivious of time and of the looks of the sailors, who were getting things ship-shape for the night.

Have you ever compared the list of subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL in your union with the list of your most active workers? Try it!

His mind was busy with Angela's looks and words. He was drawn to her by her innocence and beauty, and was delighted to see that she had refused strong drink.

"If she is an abstainer, there is no obstacle between us. Perhaps she is my fate," he said to himself, and smiled comfortably.

At last he roused himself and sauntered down to his cabin, happier than he had felt in his recollection. The Major was sound asleep and snoring. Harford turned into his berth, slept and dreamed, not of fair girls and happiness, but of a hideous monster with huge fangs, which was trying to get at him!

"A nightmare," he said, as he wakened in a cold sweat. He got up and opened his porthole. The salt, moist air rushed in and he slept again, lulled by the great untiring lullaby of the ocean, the subdued and regular breaking of the sea.

His first sensation upon awaking was that of a pleasurable experience of the day before. The unaccustomed sounds of ship life mystified him until full consciousness returned. Every object in the cabin was bathed in golden warmth; the mellow radiance of sea and sky seemed to flow around him, rejuvenating him after a restless night.

He put his head out of the porthole. The sea was like a great lake, so glassy was its surface. Yet the majestic sweep of the water was indescribable. It was with difficulty he withdrew his eyes and began to dress.

Freed from the spell of the ocean, his mind reverted to the interests of the day before. One personality occupied his thoughts.

The bell rang for breakfast as he hurried his dressing.

"Halloa! Harford, what have you been up to?" said the Major, as he appeared in the saloon as others were leaving.

"Overslept myself."

"Ah, night walks on deck with young ladies, good narcotic, etc? But don't be in too great a hurry, my boy."

"What do you mean?"

"She is someone else's property!"

"How do you know?"

"Her friend, Mrs. Carlyle, told me last night that she is going to marry a Civilian, a Deputy Commissioner at Seraneb."

Harford bit his lips and said nothing: his eyes clouded and his heart sank.

"Did she not tell you? She was talking fairly fast, I noticed," said the Major.

"All about her past life, she did not touch upon the future."

"Well, old fellow, no harm done; plenty more fish in the sea."

"Certainly," said Harford, coldly.

The Major left him to his breakfast, and Harford was glad.

"Stupid fool I am. Always building castles without foundations! Yet she is a beauty, and I could have loved her," he grumbled.

NATIONAL W. C. T. U. PUBLISHING HOUSE, Evanston, Illinois

A tiny boy in white sailor clothes and white shoes was frisking round Angela O'Connor when Harford went on deck.

He tried to avoid them, but Angela spying him, caught the child's hand, and came quickly up to him.

"Here is the third of our party, Mr. Harford, little Eric Carlyle!"

She looked like a bit of sunshine. Her radiant face, with its fine, pure outline and rose-leaf complexion, seemed in the daylight even more angelic than in the dim evening.

He lifted his cap, but did not smile, when he greeted the boy, who lisped out, "Play horses with Eric."

"He wants you to go down on your hands and knees and take him on your back," she explained.

"Another day, Kiddie; I'm busy now."

Angela placed her left hand on the boy's bright head and his eyes caught the glitter of a fine diamond ring.

"Engagement ring, no doubt," he muttered, and with an "Excuse me," he hurried away.

Angela's face clouded. "He looks very stiff and stern this morning; perhaps he is not well. I am sure he is a good man," she said to herself.

All that day, in spite of Angela's shy looks, which he several times caught traveling his way, he kept steadily to his writing and did not come near the little party.

But the next morning he got up in a different mood. "Why should I avoid her?" he asked himself. "She does not object to my company, and for the few days of this voyage at least we can be friends."

So after breakfast he walked up to the two women, who were ensconced in their deck chairs with books and work, and sat down for a chat. Angela's slender white hands held a piece of lace work, but her eyes were on his face with a glad light of greeting in them.

Without introduction to the subject, he looked straight at the diamond ring, and said, "I hear you are engaged to be married."

She blushed, and looked down at her needle-work.

"Yes, I am going to marry Mr. Fortescue of the Civil Service. Here is his photograph."

She silently handed him a locket.

He gazed at the face of a man about thirty-eight, and then handed the locket back with the words, "I wish you good luck, Miss O'Connor."

"You are both in the same Service," she replied. "I hope we shall see you often."

"Very unlikely," he replied.

Her face fell. "You speak as if you did not want to know us." Her eyes sent up a pathetic appeal which was irresistible.

He was taken off his guard, his eyes grew soft as they met hers, a hot color burned in his cheeks, and he was on the point of utterance, when he checked himself and smiling politely at her he caught up the boy, Eric, and carried him off on his shoulder, much to the urchin's delight.

He brought the boy back in a few moments.

Angela's head was bent over her work, and she did not look up, so, lifting his cap, he strolled away.

Harford was determined not to avoid Miss O'Connor, but he was careful to shun the personal or confidential in their intercourse. He brought books and magazines and read to the two women as they lounged in their deck chairs.

Mrs. Carlyle treated him with some hauteur, and he grew daily to dislike her. Her tone of mind was abhorrent to him. Her ideas of life were the "eat, drink, and be merry, for to-morrow we die" type. Bridge, accompanied by whisky pegs, was her chief pursuit.

"She is not fit to have the care of that innocent girl," he said to the Major.

"The girl was ignorant of the world when she stepped on board, but I fancy she will have learned a good deal before she steps off," rejoined Major Orde.

"Such a teacher!!" ejaculated Harford.

"Oh, well, old fellow, don't worry; her prospective husband is no chicken. Let her learn something before she goes to him."

"If she belonged to me——" Harford began.

"But she doesn't, so, my boy, she is not your business."

Harford reddened and turned away.

TRIO TEAM CHIT CHAT

Della F. Withers, Circulation Manager

Congratulations to Grady County, Georgia, Second on the County Trio Team Honor Roll,

Mrs. Frank T. Brown, President

Who Will Be the Next?

Every mail brings letters like the following, telling of the growing popularity of the Trio Team plan. We hope before many months to have on our Trio Team list every local union in the United States.

From Milo, Maine: "Enclosed is check for $6.30. The subscriptions are all new—our Trio-Team and one more."

From Redwood Falls, Minn: "You will notice I am sending our treasurer's and secretaries' subscriptions. Our president already has THE UNION SIGNAL, so this will give us the Trio-Team in this union."

New Hartford, Mo., sends in twelve subscriptions and says, "It seems we are entitled to a free subscription for sending in so many from one union of twenty-five members."

"Enclosed find draft for $4.50 for which please send THE SIGNAL to our 'trio-team,'" writes Yates Center, Kansas.

"The enclosed subscription finishes our Trio-Team," reports New Haven, N. Y.

Tuscola (Ill.) W. C. T. U. sends in three subscriptions for its Trio-Team of officers.

"At a meeting of our local union we decided to present THE UNION SIGNAL to our Trio-Team," writes Mrs. Alice L. Beam, president of the LeMoyne (Pa.) W. C. T. U. "I am already a subscriber, so enclose check for $3.00 for subscriptions for the other two officers."

"In a regular meeting yesterday our union voted to send the weekly UNION SIGNAL to the other members of our Trio-Team, as our president's subscription has already been renewed," writes Martha Young of Vergennes, Ill.

The Young Crusader to Help Law Observance

"Young Crusaders are being sent to a number of our little Portuguese children, among whom we are starting a cooking class. We believe this little paper will sow the seeds of truth in that section of the city where we know home-brew is being made, and thus help to make law-abiding homes.

—Lena W. Sparks,
Providence, R. I.

Breweries Continue to Go Out of Business

"More beer and other liquors sold than ever before," says the man who insists that the laws against drink are not operating. But if this is the case why is it that so many brewers are continuing to give up their particular business for some other? In Chicago the Wahl-Henius Institute was at one time the laboratory of the brewers of America. An exchange says it has recently been sold to the American Bakers' Association, and although it is to continue as a laboratory, it will operate for bread-makers, where without expense to themselves young men will be given instruction in scientific bread-making. If science was needed for liquor making, what will it not do when used to increase the health-giving properties of bread?

But this is not the only brewery recently gone into other business. In Pennsylvania alone, a state so "wet" that many have thought it could never be anything else, the indications are that the moisture is gradually evaporating, Recent reports from various sections of the state show that five breweries have been converted into ice plants, and are now engaged in the manufacture of ice, ice-cream, distilled water, and the like. Another former brewery is now an electric light plant, two are wholesale grocery establishments, in a fourth are now being made woolen blankets, while still a fifth has been dismantled, and according to reports its machinery has been sent to Japan. Others are supposed to be manufacturing near-beer and soft drinks. Even though a question mark may be put beside the "near" and "soft," it is a foregone conclusion that it is only a matter of time until they too will either eliminate the question from the minds of the people or be relegated to the scrap heap.

Union Signal Quiz

1. Name several cities whose councils have opposed any resolution asking for modification of prohibitory laws. What is the attitude of your council?
2. Why is it worth while to spend time and money to get to the interior of China?
3. Does the experience of Miss Tinling throw any light on the question, is the work of the missionary worth while?
4. Give a brief talk on the transformation of one saloon and dance hall.
5. What are some of the activities of white ribboners in Uruguay?
6. In a four-minute speech discuss W. C. T. U. work in other parts of the world.
7. Show the importance of the attitude of the press toward prohibition. How are the papers of your community molding public sentiment?
8. Are you using the "star in the window" in your law observance campaign?
9. Tell the story of Lincoln's "First Temperance Lecture."
10. How are the Jews showing their loyalty to the Eighteenth Amendment?

Four Steps

A news item in an eastern paper says that the four steps in the downfall of a drinker of bootleg whisky were outlined succinctly by Magistrate Stanley of New York city, in suspending sentence on Jullo Goman, who pleaded guilty of intoxication.

"Last night you landed in the station house," said the magistrate. "Today you land in court. Tomorrow, if you continue to drink that whisky you will land in Bellevue Hospital, and the next day you will land in the morgue."

SENATE BILL PROPOSES TWENTY NEW FEDERAL JUDGES—CONGRESS MAY EXTEND IMMIGRATION LAW—NAVAL HOLIDAY MAY SAVE $200,000,000—WASHINGTONIANS ADVANCE TOWARD REPRESENTATION IN CONGRESS—MANY FORMER SERVICE MEN IN PROHIBITION FORCE—SOLDIER BONUS BIG PROBLEM

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

Senate Bill Proposes Twenty New Federal Judges

As a means of relieving congestion in certain judicial districts, the Senate Judiciary Committee agreed to report a bill providing for nineteen additional United States district judges and one additional circuit judge. The Committee, it was said, will propose that the Fourth circuit consisting of the states of Maryland, West Virginia, Virginia and North and South Carolina, shall have an additional judge. It will also propose additional district judges, distributed as follows: Two to Massachusetts, two to southern New York, and one each in eastern New York, eastern Pennsylvania, western Pennsylvania, northern Ohio, northern Illinois, eastern Michigan, Minnesota, eastern Missouri, eastern Oklahoma, Montana, northern California, southern California, northern Texas, Arizona, and northern Georgia.

In addition to increasing the number of judges, the bill also carries other provisions aimed at a more efficient handling of Federal court business throughout the country. Among other things, it is proposed that there shall be held in Washington annually for consultation, a conference of senior circuit judges, at which the Chief Justice of the United States shall preside.

The bill has passed the House, but the changes proposed by the Senate committee will necessitate its being sent to conference when passed by the Senate.

Congress Will Consider Extending 3 Per Cent Immigration Law

The House Committee on Immigration has reported favorably on the extension of the 3 per cent immigration restriction law. The present law expires automatically at the end of June this year unless it is extended by the Congress. There is divided opinion regarding its virtue as a policy and as a practicable means of limiting immigration. There are those who believe that the ratio plan, which admits only a proportion of aliens from any foreign country according to the number previously admitted from that country, is the best method thus far discovered.

Figures published by the Department of Labor show that whereas 978,000 aliens came to this country during the twelve months ended June 30, 1921, during the five months from July to November, when the new law was in force, only 234,000 were admitted. Departures during the former period totaled 426,000, making the net increase 552,000. During the latter period 190,000 left, so that the net increase was 44,000. These figures present a striking contrast which is further accentuated when it is remembered that the annual quotas of sixteen countries are already exhausted and many others are nearing the limit.

Commissioner General of Immigration, W. W. Husband, in an address before the American Association of University Women, declared that but for this restrictive legislation there would have been 1,000,000 immigrants from the south and east of Europe this year. He explained that when, because of the quota law, the economic needs for immigrant labor cannot be met by the people of Southern and Eastern Europe, they will be met by new immigration from Northern and Western Europe, whence our stock is most naturally derived. "Hardships worked on the immigrants by reason of this law are much exaggerated," Mr. Husband said.

Navy Holiday May Mean Saving of $200,000,000

In a statement issued by the Federal Board it is estimated that the United States will save about $200,000,000 on the present building program of the Navy, resultant from the naval limitation pact. This estimate is regarded as excessive, however, by high officials of the Navy Department who point out that the scrapping of ships now under construction would involve payment of claims to the builders.

Limitation of armament decided upon at the Conference, the Board declared, will affect immediately savings only in the three countries—the United States, England and Japan—whose finances are already in a relatively sound condition. Savings in England and Japan, the Board estimated, would be approximately equivalent to those of this country. In France and Italy, however, the Board explained, no increase in naval armament had been contemplated so that their immediate problems would not be affected.

Washingtonians Advance Toward Representation in Congress

Representation for the people of the District of Columbia in the United States Congress moved forward a pace this week when the Senate District Committee ordered a favorable report on a resolution introduced by Senator Jones of Washington for a constitutional amendment to permit Washingtonians to vote for senators and representatives and for presidential and vice-presidential electors.

The same committee took favorable action on the Poindexter bill, providing for a delegate to represent the District in the House. The votes in committee on this measure indicated a strong sentiment for representation in the Congress. It is realized that it would take some time to get the constitutional amendment ratified by the states; hence the move to give representation in the House which could be done by congressional action alone.

The Poindexter bill provides that a delegate shall have a seat on the floor, be eligible to service on the District of Columbia Committee of the House, be entitled to speak in the House, but not to vote.

Out of 2,886 in Prohibition Force 618 Former Service Men

More than 30 per cent of the prohibition field forces are former service men, and over 45 per cent of the clerical force rendered war service according to figures recently made public by Prohibition Commissioner Haynes.

Mr. Haynes' figures showed that out of a total force of 2,886, including state directors, supervisors, agents, chemists, legal advisors and clerks, 818 served their country during the war.

"It is the policy of the prohibition unit," Mr. Haynes said, "to give every possible preference in employment to former service men," and since he assumed the office of Commissioner former service men have constituted 60 per cent of the appointments in the prohibition forces, both in Washington and throughout the various states, territories and insular possessions.

Capper-Volstead Bill Signed By the President

The Capper-Volstead co-operative marketing bill, which legalizes co-operative associations of farmers and producers for marketing purposes and exempts them from the operation of the Sherman anti-trust law, was signed today by President Harding.

How To Provide Soldier Bonus Big Problem of the Congress

President Harding in a letter addressed to Chairman Fordney of the House Ways and Means Committee, gave his views of the proposed soldier bonus legislation. He declared he could suggest no other plan for raising the needed revenues than that of the general sales tax, which he said would distribute the cost of rewarding the former service men in such manner that it would be borne by all the people whom they served.

One of the features of the Executive's letter is his declaration that rather than provide for maximum cash payments, to extend over a period of two and one-half years, it would be better to "await the day when we may safely undertake to pay in full, so that the award may be turned to real advantage."

The straight cash bonus is only one aspect of the matter, and there are many who believe that the best thought is in favor of compensation in homestead lands, with easy-term provisions for borrowing money to develop these, and of paid-up insurance. It is evident that the best solution of the problem is a matter of grave concern to the congressmen.

Willard Memorial Services in Statuary Hall

On the afternoon of February 17 impressive memorial services were held in Statuary Hall near the statue of Frances E. Willard. The services were under the auspices of the District Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the president, Mrs. Emma Sanford Shelton, presiding.

Senator Willis of Ohio and Representative A. P. Nelson of Wisconsin were the inspiring speakers. They paid beautiful tributes to the life and work of our great leader in moral, social, educational and political reform. Prayer was made by Rev. Montgomery, Chaplain of the House, and music furnished by the male quartette of the Vermont Avenue Christian Church.

Largest Wine Cask Will be Sold As Old Lumber

Prohibition, says the Popular Science Monthly, is responsiblo for tho recent decision to sell the largest wine-cask in tho United States, a monster, wooden storage vat once ono of the "sights" of Toledo. The cask used to hold several hundred barrels of wino, and when first built, cost more than $4,000. Its size necessitated the erection of a special building to cover it. As no use can be found for either cask or building, both have been abandoned, and will be sold as old lumber.

Arizona May Strengthen Its Dry and Gambling Laws

Amendments strengthening Arizona's prohibition and gambling laws were recommended at the closing session of the county attorneys' association, recently meeting at Nogales, and resolutions were adopted asking Governor Campbell to urge, in his proposed call for a special session of the legislature, the adoption of amendments to these laws, making it a crime to possess a still or any other apparatus for the manufacture of liquor, or to have any form of gambling in the state.

How the Dry Law Works In Racine, Wisconsin

In order to supply actual facts as they exist in Racine, Wisconsin, the chief of police has made public the records of his department as far back as the year 1915. They show that the peak in the number of arrests for drunkenness and disorderly conduct was reached in 1918, at which time there were 154 saloons. In that year the arrests for these two causes were 705 in number, as compared with the total of 273 for the year just closed, thus proving the falsity of the statement which has been made that intoxication has increased in Racine since the dry laws went into effect. The records show, also, that the reduction in the number of arrests for intoxication began the first of July, 1919, at the beginning of the "dry spell."

Pneumonia Without Alcohol Better Chance For Cure

In his department in the Chicago Tribune, "How to Keep Well," Dr. W. A. Evans cautions his readers against the germs of influenza and pneumonia, and says: "The use of alcohol is almost a certain invitation to fatal infection, and the present clandestine indulgence in spirits of unknown purity indicates the need of special caution in this regard. Fatigue is a depressant of intense character, and when one or more of these known determined factors are associated the possibilities are great."

March 17 "No Tobacco" Day in Arkansas

Declaring that tobacco is a "slow and insidious destroyer of the fitness of the race," and its use a loathsome and expensive habit, but believing it " a subject for educators and moralists, rather than for courts and statutes," the governor of Arkansas has set aside March 17 as a day for a campaign of education and precaution against its use.

Prohibition Increases Use of Skates

A salesman of one of the largest hardware companies in the city of Milwaukee is quoted by the Milwaukee (Wisconsin) Leader as reporting that prohibition has increased the popularity of skating.

"Prohibition has shot up our sales records in skates more than 75 per cent over that of last season," he said. "Twelve hundred pairs of skates have been sold by this one concern up to the present time. Tho manufacturers, it is said, are refusing acceptance of future orders.

"It's not the young to whom I sell the most skates, but to the middle aged," he added, "and those who have stopped counting birthdays."

Ask the Babies Whether Prohibition Pays!

Prohibition is causing an alarming scarcity of babies for adoption! This was the startling statement made by C. C. Carstens, director of the Child Welfare League of America before a meeting of that organization recently held in Chicago. This organization was formed for the purpose of insuring unfortunate children a chance in the world, providing them with proper care and careful training. Hitherto, Mr. Carstens told his audience, the supply of children for adoption has always been greater than the demand, but now, for the first time, conditions are reversed and there is a shortage due to the fact that prohibition has so improved conditions in the home that babies are no longer turned over to foundling asylums. Even unemployment and want have not disrupted families as did the saloons.

North Carolina's New Commissioner of Public Welfare A Woman

Mrs. Clarence Johnson, formerly president of the state federation of Women's Clubs, has been chosen as the new Commissioner of Public Welfare in North Carolina. The Legislative Counselor says that among the forty candidates, she was the best fitted both by training and experience for such an important position.

Homes for Inebriates an Index of Prohibition

"Reports that drinking is as prevalent as ever are certainly without foundation and are largely propaganda," states Judge J. Kent Greene of Chicago, manager of Chicago's Commerce Court and president of the Washingtonian Home of that city. To substantiate his assertion Judge Greene points out the fact that this institution for the treatment of inebriates is the only one out of sixty or more in the country to survive, and even its future is made doubtful by its slim patronage. Since 1863, the year it was founded, the home has cared for 41,779 people, but at the present time there are but twelve inmates, of whom only three are alcoholics. "We haven't had any 'repeaters' for a month or more," says the judge, "while they used to be always with us. In 1917 there were 450 admissions for the first time, 150 for the second time, and 100 for the third time in the year. Our total admissions for January were only eight, six of these being alcoholics.

"I can draw only one conclusion from this steady and sharp decline in the number of inebriates, and that is that vastly less liquor is being used today than formerly."

Secretary Mellon Denies Making Statement Credited to Him By Liquorites

In an appeal for support of the movement to legalize the sale of beer and light wines in the interests of the Hill bill for the exemption of beer from the provisions of the Volstead law the New Jersey branch of the Association against the Prohibition Amendment are using the following statement credited to Secretary Mellon of the Treasury Department:

"Secretary Mellon has advocated that beer and light wines be legalized under proper restrictions, stating that a large revenue could be immediately available thereby. .....If you agree with the Secretary of the Treasury will you not write or telegraph to the Hon. Joseph W. Fordney, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, Washington, D. C., etc., your belief?"

Secretary Mellon has declared through the press that the statement is unauthorized, was never made by him, and has denounced the use of his name in this connection as "flagrant and unwarrantable."

Liquor Not to Return to Florida

Mrs. W. S. Jennings of Jacksonville, Florida, who was among those in attendance upon the board meetings of the Federation of Women's Clubs, asserted that prohibition is going splendidly in Florida. "How are we doing it? Well, we realized that public sentiment is necessary to enforce law, therefore a statewide committee of five hundred leading citizens (and this will shortly be increased to five thousand) gathered together to see that the public conscience was aroused. When we found certain officials were not attending to their 'job,' we put them out of office and elected others who would uphold the law.

"I can remember when my father would not let me go out on election day. So terrible were conditions under the liquor regime, because each side tried to win votes with whisky, that it was not safe for a woman to go near the polling places when an election was in progress. Under present prohibition conditions, however, women not only go to the polls in perfect comfort and safety, but the policemen in charge make only one arrest, where in former years they might make thirty or forty.

"We in Florida are certain that we shall never allow liquor to come back."

Mrs. Jennings is a cousin of William Jennings Bryan.

First Woman in Higher Chamber of Swedish Parliament

The first woman to have a place in the upper house in the Swedish parliament has just been elected—Miss Kersten Hesselgren, who has spent most of her life in the study of social conditions in her own country, and in Germany, England, and the United States. She was the first woman to hold position as inspector of labor, and is a member of the social commission and of the womans' council in Sweden.

Oregon Commercial Club To Ostracize Liquor Buyers

At its regular monthly meeting recently the Hood River Commercial club, says the Portland (Oregon) Oregonian, adopted a resolution pledging its support to the prohibition law and proposing that any business men found purchasing liquor be socially "ostracized."

WHY WOMEN IN INDUSTRY LAWS?

Mrs. Philip Zoercher, State Superintendent Women in Industry, Indiana Woman's Christian Temperance Union

"Physical debility follows fatigue. Laxity of moral fiber follows physical debility. Long hours and overwork lead to intemperance." Women's Bureau, U. S. Department of Labor.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union has always stood for an eight hour day, a living wage and adequate working conditions for all laborers, especially women, the potential mothers of the race.

Conditions of employment have changed more in the last thirty years than in the preceding thirty centuries. Machinery modifies every task today. Housewife, teacher, railroad president, stenographer, cotton spinner,—each depends on machinery for much or all of the day's work. Machinery is labor-saving. That is, through speed, it saves labor cost to the owner of its product. But any woman who has run a sewing machine for eight hours a day knows that machinery does not save labor energy to the worker.

Constant Concentration Injurious

Before the introduction of machinery, each laborer, as a rule, made a complete article; his entire mind was occupied and the work was not so fatiguing. Now all is changed,—one man or woman works on a single process, frequently a very minute object. Constant concentration of mind and muscle upon one thing in time narrows body and soul.

The ideal machine does one thing over and over. Human beings can rest as they work only if they change work. Jane's mother grumbled at the monotony of washing the same dishes three times a day. Jane herself plugs in telephone connections 8½ hours per day, 225 calls per hour, 3½ per minute during busy hours. Imagine washing the same dish 3,000 times a week—and doing nothing else! Mary inspects 72,000 cans of peas each day of the season. Helen, at her power machine, puts in 2,400,000 stitches between every breakfast and dinner.

Rest Is Essential

Rest is more and more indispensable as work becomes more specialized, more intense. The strain of machine tending cannot be entirely lessened. To relax speed is un-American. Regulations as to seats, lights, ventilation, proper height of working surfaces, rest rooms, etc., are known as "working conditions" laws or agreements. They are attempts to lessen the fatigue of the worker while on the job.

Production of work, the employer's chief interest, is often actually increased by shortening the hours of labor. The shorter day, shorter week, one day rest in seven and limitation of night work laws are efforts to give the modern worker, forced to keep up with a machine, necessary rest between work periods. Most of our industrial laws are naturally framed for the factory where work is most dominated by machinery.

"It is widely believed, and especially by employers of labor, that longer hours mean necessarily a greater output. A man can of course accomplish more in two hours than in one hour, but it does not follow that he can accomplish more in ten than in eight hours." Industrial Efficiency Report U. C. Public Health Service.

See night work curve below, where the shift was twelve hours.

Dangers of Long Hours

There is no doubt in the minds of thinking people that abnormally long hours at routine tasks contribute to the incidence of disease, lower general vitality, and make accidents more likely. It is a well known fact that considerable fatigue is a contributory cause of accidents.

Over fatigue is responsible for a large number of nervous disorders. The growing prevalence of heart failure is attested by medical authorities everywhere. Whenever the laboring hours are so long that the resting period is not sufficient to relax and rejuvenate the body, and the added rest on Sunday will not compensate, then the hours are too long, and the individual is in danger of physical or mental or moral collapse.

Nervousness and Intemperance

Make a man or woman do a difficult piece of work over and over again during long hours, under a nervous strain. Add underfeeding, perhaps, with short or disturbed sleep, and a disease can be produced within two or three months. Scientific management, which speeds up the human machine, must give a correspondingly longer period of rest to compensate for the loss of energy. Temptation to overstrain is especially prevalent among piece workers who make an effort to increase the size of their pay envelopes at the sacrifice of their bodies. Any one who has visited a factory turning out high grade products has observed the great pace of the work there, the foresight and attention of each worker and the nervous tension that all are subjected to. Few can stand it for a normal lifetime. It is noticeable that about 60% of those who break down from overstrain are skilled workers, while only 40% are unskilled. Physicians agree that there is a great increase in nervous diseases. Thomas Oliver, British authority on industrial fatigue, notes the prevalence of drinking as well as disease, among the workers in occupations where accidents, exposure and strain are most constant.

Eyes and Ears

There is no organ so necessary to the laborer and none so abused as the eye. Defective eyesight may be due to constant stooping, to eye strain from detail work, to insufficient light and to glare. Alertness and exactness of attention and constant application have been carried so far that change and variety of eye work are reduced to a minimum. The noise of machinery operation contributes also to industrial fatigue.

Intensity of Modern Machine Work

Work may be so simple that full attention is not necessary, but the mind must not wander, nor any distraction vary the monotony. There is not a moment of change or rest. No wonder that insanity, which is the ultimate stage of nervousness, is on the increase!

With the intensity of modern industry, the individual worker can keep up efficient labor only on condition that the fatigue engendered on one day may be completely repaired before the next day. If not balanced by adequate rest a deficit remains which may be little and unnoticed at first, but which inevitably accumulates, and after a shorter or longer period results either in physical or mental breakdown.

Morals

Bodily exhaustion is unfavorable to the exercise of proper self-control. It produces a feverishness, a restlessness, an excited state of mind which may lead to all kinds of moral abuses. If you compel men and women to work so long each day that they have no time to think, they will become, or remain, non-thinking animals. They are thereby disqualified for sitting quietly at home, reading good books and magazines, or enjoying the family. Thousands of men and women who work long, monotonous hours must key themselves up to more work by spending what time is left between work and sleep in those pleasures that appeal most immediately and with least mental strain to an overwrought body. They must have some kind of "stimulant" that will grant the quickest relief. The moving picture show (not necessarily bad, but the more exciting, the more preferred), the pool room, the public dance hall and the saloon (when we had it) cater commercially to this demand for "stimulants." As the physical condition is permanently lowered, the moral nature suffers also. Then the lower the moral tone of these stimulants must be to reach their patrons. The prolonged debauch of the lumber-jack and the miner, exhausted by a long stretch of hard, often dangerous labor, without sane recreation, is an indictment of their working conditions rather than of the original morals of the men.

The New York Labor Bureau, among other industrial authorities, cites excessive work and long hours as promoting the use of stimulants and intoxicating drinks as a quick remedy for exhaustion. No nation can progress, if its workers are thus crippled by overexertion. Human loss is national loss.

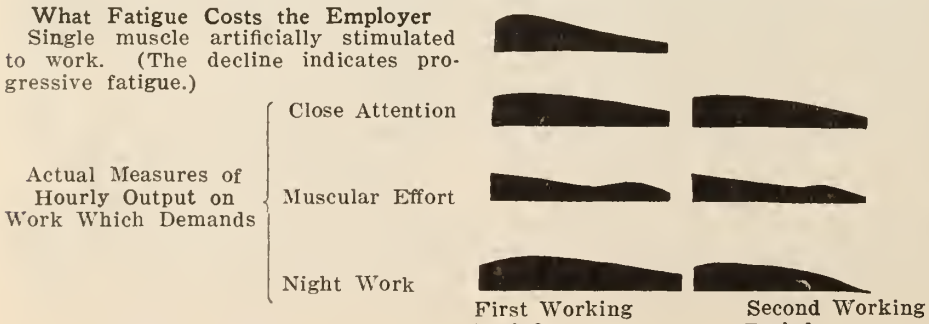
To Sum Up

Industrial fatigue is the fruitful source of innumerable evils. It ruins the health, cripples the body, shortens the life, stunts the mind, gives no opportunity for reading, study or mental improvement, blunts the morals. It tends to dissipation in various forms. It opens the door for indulgences from which flow not only degeneracy of the individual but degeneracy of the race.

We must make labor tolerable before we can make it honorable. We must dignify work by dignifying the worker. A free country demands an intelligent as well as a free people. An ignorant man cannot in truth be a free man. An ignorant woman can be neither a good citizen nor a good mother to the Americans of the morrow.

What Fatigue Costs the Employer

Single muscle artificially stimulated to work. (The decline indicates progressive fatigue.)



WHAT SOCIAL MORALITY ASKS OF A COMMUNITY

Martha P. Falconer, Associate National Director Social Morality

This department has sent out to the state superintendents of Social Morality a new annual report blank. It asks for definite information along various lines to stimulate interest and co-operation in community activities, to keep the director and her associate in touch with the work that is being done, and to secure the facts needed for the annual report of the department that each state may have credit for what has been done. Many unions have been holding meetings and discussing the question of Social Morality, but they must go further. We want them to become familiar with local conditions because it is only in this way that they will learn what is needed for a successful community program, which should stress just what the program of this department stresses, namely, education, medical measures, law enforcement, and recreation.

Education includes literature, lectures and exhibits. It is now possible to get good literature on Social Morality suited to the various individuals who go to make up a community but it is not enough to hand out literature which has the endorsement of the W. C. T. U., the State Department of Health, or some other equally reliable agency. There are pamphlets and books prepared especially for the adolescent boy or girl, for the mother of small children, and for the boy or girl who has left school, is making his or her own way in the world, and is subject to the dangers that always beset the unprotected. Let the literature be selected with care and distributed so wisely that each piece shall reach just the one for whom it was written and come as a personal message when most needed. But the giving out of leaflets is not all. The public libraries usually have good books on Social Morality and if not, they should be encouraged to buy them, or should be presented with a copy or two expressly for the use of boys and girls, who should then be informed, either through the library or the union, that the books are there for them to read.

In every school some instruction in social hygiene should be given, by means of lectures and talks, to high school boys and girls and to those in the seventh and eighth grades. If no provision is made for this work in the regular school curriculum then the local union, either alone, or with the aid of other agencies, should arrange for these talks.

Social Morality exhibits should be given at state and county fairs and conventions, and on other occasions when large numbers of people congregate, especially from rural communities where such exhibits are not accessible. A very successful exhibit including cards, posters, books and pamphlets can be arranged from available material. For exhibit suggestions correspond with the associate national director, Mrs. Martha P. Falconer, 370 Seventh Avenue, New York City.

At a health show given in New York City, under the auspices of the American Public Health Association and the city Department of Health, a three-foot shelf of standard social hygiene books attracted the attention of hundreds of serious minded men and women who examined the volumes, realized their value, and expressed regret that they "couldn't afford to buy them," yet every book in that collection is in the public libraries of New York City, many of them are in city libraries throughout the country, and all are moderate in price.

We have asked for information about free clinics for the treatment of venereal disease cases because it is important for W. C. T. U. members to know what medical measures are needed in a community, and to what extent and in what manner the work is being done, that they may stimulate local health authorities to provide clinics for those who need care. For years this was neglected and it was difficult for those who required treatment to obtain it from a reliable physician. With the interest and financial aid given by the Federal government through the U. S. Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board, the state departments have helped to establish these clinics. It is of the greatest importance that our sons in the service of the government shall be protected from those women who are a menace to their moral and physical welfare. Dr. Valeria H. Parker is now in charge of this branch of the Federal government and it will depend upon the action of Congress whether the work will be continued. As the present appropriation is for one year only, it will be necessary to urge a renewal of the grant. Every community where soldiers or sailors are stationed has a trained social worker, and the Social Morality department hopes the unions located in the vicinity of camps or naval bases appreciate the work that is being done, are giving all the aid and encouragement in their power to those engaged in this service, and will use their influence for its retention. The U. S. Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board should be continued until such a time as the work is taken over in its entirety by some other branch of the Federal government.

It is necessary to know what laws have been passed by your state legislature in order to ascertain whether they are being enforced, ignored, or evaded, and to know what ones to recommend to the next legislature. A Social Hygiene Legislation Manual, giving the legal status of social morality in each state, has been prepared with great care. The laws passed within the last year are not included but they can readily be added to the chart which shows how the various states compare in relation to the social morality laws now in force. The Manual, which also suggests model laws based on the best ones now in force, can be obtained from the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, Evanston, Illinois, at twenty-five cents a copy, and should be in every public library.

It is of the greatest importance that wholesome recreation should be provided, under proper supervision, for our young people. In this the local union can co-operate with churches and other agencies in carrying out a program, which no one agency could do alone. Just as long as it is human to crave excitement, young people will continue to venture into paths that are dangerous, and to satisfy their desire it is necessary to provide sufficient wholesome recreation and amusement. The unions should become familiar with the valuable service of policewomen in all parts of the country. When a good piece of work is being done it is of the utmost importance to encourage it and to co-operate with the local agencies responsible for its perpetuity. An element too often lacking is the mobilization of the various agencies and forces for a concerted plan of vigorous action along broad and carefully thought out lines. Just as in Washington we learned, during the war, to work together to save duplication of effort and produce the best results with the material at hand, so the unions must learn to co-operate with the various local agencies in order to get the work done and to have it made most effective.

"STUDYING THE PAST AND MAKING SAFE THE PRESENT"

Christine I. Tinling

(Last week, in the article, "Three Miles an Hour," Miss Tinling gave some of her experiences in reaching the Boy's School, situated in Hung Tung, the province of Shansi, in the heart of China. This week's story of the events occurring during her stay in Shansi shows how the Jubilee Fund is working for the coming of the Kingdom of Christ. —Editors.)

The session had just opened with one hundred and thirty-one boys, some forty of them new students, for the most part from heathen homes. They, as well as the missionaries, gave me a royal welcome. As it happened, an entertainment was held that week by way of a reception to the new boys. It took place in one of the court-yards, which was suitably decorated with flags and greenery. When we foreigners arrived on the scene, we were surprised to see above the platform, neatly printed in English on red paper, the words, "Welcome, Miss Tinling." One of the students in the course of the proceedings voiced this welcome in a speech, also in the language of the visitor. He expressed their appreciation of the effort that had been made to reach them, and one wondered that they should realize this as they did, since Shansi traveling is the only kind they know.

Three times every day the whole school assembled to hear an address, two of the talks being on temperance topics and the third a Bible one at chapel time. At the close of the week the boys gave a program, and a junior school from the city came up to hear them speak. Twenty-three students ordered charts so as to do practical work, and some manuals were bought besides, though these country boys have very little money.

Aim of the W. C. T. U. Expressed by Ancient Classics

On the occasion of this meeting the dear fellows presented me with three beautiful scrolls, a picture for the center, and two mottoes to hang, one on each side of it, in the most approved Chinese style. The middle scroll bears this inscription:—

"Tenth year of the Chinese Republic, in the Month of Harvest. A copy of the work of 'An Inhabitant of the Hsinlo Mountains.' Painted by Ch'eng Kuang Shih." So it serves as a reminder of those mountains which have been so full of charm for me, as well as being a souvenir of the school. The other scrolls are two classical quotations introduced in the following polite way:—

"For the American Miss Tinling, who has not feared travel by land and water, and has disgraced herself by drawing near to our miserable city, to teach us the poisonous harm of smoke and wine, to our great benefit, we have copied the inscriptions of Fan Shih of the Wei Dynasty and the eulogy from the 'Stone Gate' of the Han Dynasty, to eulogize her great virtue, and shall eternally remember her without forgetting."

The two sentiments chosen by these boys of Inland China are these:—

"Spreading culture and succoring the people so that all animate life may prosper."

"Studying the past and making safe the present, so that the whole world may become a brotherhood."

Surely the very selection of them is suggestive of an appreciation of the aim of the W. C. T. U. The thought of succoring the people so that all may prosper, and studying past history and experience so as to make the present safe, was it not in the hearts of those American mothers who sent us on this errand to the young men and women of China? And these have understood. Enclosed within their mountain walls, these boys have not heard the million voices crying, "Make the world safe for democracy." But to them also the thought has come, and out of their own ancient classics they have culled a suitable expression of it, and it is their desire so to study the past as to make the present safe.

"Ask And Ye Shall Receive"

On my last evening, the principal, Mr. Hogben, suggested that if any of the students had decided for Christ during the week, they should at their convenience state the same in writing. After I had left the city, he sent me ten slips of paper, with a column of Chinese characters on each. Every one stood for a definite decision. "Han Kuei-uen decidedly intends to be Jesus' disciple," says one; "Wen Ming-teh sets his will to be the Lord's true disciple," says another; "Wang Hsu-chen decides to be the Lord's disciple forever," and so on. Needless to say, these scraps of Chinese tissue paper are a priceless treasure to me. The experience was a clear illustration of answered prayer, for the missionaries of two stations were united in urgently pleading that some of the boys might be led during the week to accept Christ. It has set me wondering what would happen if some hundreds of our women at home should stir themselves up to take hold of God for the work here, and should pray not only for success in advocating the temperance cause, but for real spiritual results besides. Surely, as a rule, we have not because we ask not.

At Hwochow I visited the Girls' Middle and Normal School belonging to the same mission. It was a great privilege to be there, in that little oasis of refinement and culture, where three English ladies of quite exceptional ability have built up a strong educational and evangelistic work. Miss Evangeline French came into Shansi before the Boxer troubles and suffered almost unto death. Later she was joined by her sister, Miss Mildred Cable, who is well known as an authoress and educator and has for twenty years been training young women for service. When she began her work scarcely a woman in the neighborhood could read. Now between seven and eight hundred girls have passed through the school, and about a hundred are at present occupying positions as teachers in Shansi and other provinces. The members of Miss Cable's staff go out two and two into the city and carry on some half a dozen Sunday-schools in as many court-yards, while the elder girls take charge of the station Sunday school and teach the younger scholars, the compound women and heathen neighbors. It is taken for granted that each receives in order to give.

Contradictory Doctrines

At Hwochow as at Hung Tung I had usually three engagements a day within the school compound and I found the girls very much alive and alert. Apropos of hygiene, however, Miss French warned me that some of the new-comers might have difficulty in comprehending the mysteries of germs. A lady doctor a while ago gave an impressive address on the conservation of health in which she dwelt at length on the danger of flies, and bade the women beware. As the audience dispersed one was heard to remark to her neighbor, "Well, after all, everybody is afraid of something. We Chinese fear devils; the foreigners fear flies." It seems she had previously been told that Christians, unlike the heathen, knew no alarms, and this was plainly contradictory!

Travel in Shansi

It is pleasant to see that the city officials highly appreciate what this school is doing for their community. When the three ladies last left on furlough the mandarin presented them with a hand some red silk banner, on which he had painted with his own hands characters setting forth the high esteem in which they were held for their work's sake.

Grasping the Opportunity

On the Sunday that I spent in Hwochow, government students and townspeople came by special invitation to service in the church. The city boys' school was quite imposing as it marched through the streets with banners waving led by a brass band. The music called the attention of all and sundry to the fact that on this bright morning the were paying a friendly visit to the Christians. The girls' government school also came and sat with the women on the other side of the curtain. The men half of the auditorium was crowded its utmost capacity and many were standing both inside and out. These people for the most part heathen, sat and stood through an address of three-quarters an hour with the same attention and respect as are observed in a church home.

We gave them a patriotic talk on China's enemies, Miss Cable and I, finishing

STUDIES IN GOVERNMENT

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Deborah Knox Livingston, National Director of Christian Citizenship

The tremendous part played in the recent world war by the United States has raised in the minds of the people, as perhaps never before, questions as to what are the laws and usages that govern us in international relations.

The United States places all power relative to matters of international character in the Federal Government. The Constitution expressly forbids individual states entering into negotiations with foreign countries. The management of international affairs is in the hands of the President and Senate.

The Diplomatic Service

The Diplomatic Service consists of ambassadors and ministers. The ambassadors hold the highest rank in the diplomatic corps. Their duties are many and deal largely with the problems of statecraft. An ambassador is the personal representative of the ruler of the country from which he comes.

We send ambassadors to Great Britain, Germany, France, Italy, Austria, Mexico, Russia, Brazil, Japan, Spain, Chile, Argentina; and in other countries we are represented by ministers.

According to international law, the residence or property of an ambassador or foreign minister is exempt from the laws of the country to which he is sent, such property or residence being under the dominion of the country which the ambassador or minister represents.

The Consular Service

The Consular Service consists of consuls, who are the business agents of the government. They are sent to the larger seaports and inland cities of foreign countries to look after the interests of the citizens of their own country.

The consul has many duties, such as certifying to births, deaths and marriages among his countrymen in his consular district. He receives applications for and grants passports.

Treaties

A treaty may be defined as a compact or agreement entered into by two or more nations for their common good, either in time of war or peace. Such a treaty, when made and signed by the proper diplomatic agents, becomes the law of the nations that enter into the compact.

In the United States the President, acting through the Secretary of State, negotiates with foreign governments in the matter of treaties. When a treaty has been created and approved by the President, it is then forwarded to the Senate, where, according to our Constitution, it must be ratified by a two-thirds vote.

International Arbitration

For more than a hundred years it has been the hope of all civilized countries that a time would come when war would be no more. In the nineteenth century, more international disputes were settled by arbitration than ever before in the history of the world. Since the recent world war, the most terrible in loss of life, destruction of property and number of countries engaged in the conflict, the hope for a League of Nations or some other Peace League has been strong in the hearts of the people in every land. The purpose of such a league is set forth in the preamble of the Covenant of The League of Nations, which says,—"To promote international co-operation and to achieve international peace and security by the acceptance of all its members of the obligation not to resort to war, but to maintain open, honorable and just relations with all nations and to maintain scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations."

International Understanding

The people of the United States, as well as those of other lands, are beginning to understand that we cannot live in "splendid isolation" from each other but that our prosperity and well being is dependent upon our relations to other countries. There is no greater barrier to the harmonious relations between the nations of the world than the lack of mutual confidence. Where the spirit of suspicion is fostered, there can be no confidence. This is as true between nations as it is between individuals. The greatest contribution that can be made to world peace is an intelligent understanding, gained from accurate information, regarding the existing conditions in each country. Our international relations are not merely relations that are dependent upon material and economic facts but upon the spirit which interprets these facts to the people of each country.

The world war has taught us the interdependence of peoples and countries in the time of war; we must recognize that same interdependence in the time of peace, if we are to see the realization of world harmony, which alone can bring prosperity and progress to the nations of the earth.

Questions

1. Where is placed the power regarding international affairs?
2. Can individual states enter into negotiations with foreign countries?
3. Of what does the Diplomatic Service consist?
4. What are some of the countries to which we send ambassadors?
5. How does the Consular Service differ from the Diplomatic Service?
6. What are some of the duties of a consul?
7. What is a treaty?
8. How are treaties negotiated in the United States?
9. What has been accomplished by international arbitration?
10. How can international understanding be secured?

with the gospel as offering the only way of deliverance both for the individual and the nation. These opportunities are very much to be prized. The outsiders naturally do not come to church except on special occasions, such as a patriotic rally. Would that their interest in their country's welfare might often prove the needed link between them and Christ!

Of such special occasions, they say that the most noteworthy was the Peace Celebration at the close of the Great War. Governor Yen issued an order that public thanksgiving be rendered to the Supreme Being. He is a progressive and enlightened man, not yet a professing Christian but a long way from being a heathen. He prohibited incense burning before the idols at this time. Leading men came to good old Pastor Wang and asked advice. "We may not hold this service in a temple" they said, "for we are forbidden to worship the gods who are there, and we know not how to approach the Supreme Being." "We approach Him through His Son," said the pastor. "Come and meet with us and we will show you how to pray to Him." So the Peace Celebration in Hwochow was a Christian service.

Rescuing Opium Addicts

Some very beautiful rescue work is being done in this station in a quiet way. Dear old Mrs. Ma has been busy at it for years, devoting herself to women who are victims of the opium habit. To see her toddling about the court-yard on her little bound feet, in plain cotton trousers and san-tzu, who would guess what she really is? She long ago left a lovely home and renounced a life of comfort to pour herself out for these needy ones. Opium addicts are degraded, besotted, and to the ordinary mind untouchable. Mrs. Ma lives with them, sleeps with them on the kang, comforts and supports them in their struggle to give up the drug, teaches them the gospel and prays them into the Kingdom of God. About a hundred and fifty women have passed through the refuge under her loving care. We might search through the ranks of our world-wide organization and we should probably find nothing more beautiful, more Christ-like than the work which this old lady is doing, shut away in an Eastern court-yard.

Original Temperance Posters

A third busy center of educational effort in this inland province is Fenchow, a station of the American Board of Foreign Missions. Here is a large compound, or rather quite a village, with fine commodious buildings, and still more in process of construction, and a strong group of college-trained missionaries, delighting in their work with the bright, eager Chinese students. To the visiting teacher also they were a joy, being so quick to respond to suggestions and so hospitable to ideas. The day before I left, a deputation waited on me to present a number of posters drawn by the students. One was a striking picture of the poet, Li Po, who met his death through love of drink. After a wine supper he saw the reflection of the moon in the lake and jumping into the water to seize it, he was drowned. The young Fenchow artist has depicted him in the fatal act. Another student of the Men's Bible School made a collection of proverbs relating to wine and arranged them in the form of a Chinese puzzle. Duly mounted, this interesting document will hang on many a class-room wall to sharpen the wits of the scholars. While producing the original work that one most of all desires, the Fenchow students eagerly welcomed the help of our regular S. T. I. charts. The above-mentioned deputation brought a list of seventy-four names of men and boys who had ordered a set for their personal use.

"The Harvest is Great But—"

Fenchow influences a wide area. The Men's Bible School, the smaller one for women, and two schools for boys and girls, all on the same fine compound, number about four hundred students, and there are many hundreds more in the out-stations. This year there were vacancies for twenty-two boys. Seventy-eight came and sat for the competitive entrance examination, of whom of course fifty-six went away disappointed. Two young fellows arrived late, having journeyed eleven days in the hope of being received, and another eleven days did

This is the time to present to your public library or your schools the Lincoln "Law Observance" poster. See that one is placed in the waiting station or other community gathering place. Get people to "thinking reverence for law" and before long it will result in their putting into action that reverence.

The New York W. C. T. U. has ordered 50,000 of the "White Star" Law Observance window cards. How many are being displayed in the homes of your city? Read the story on page 11 of the presentation by a club woman of the window card to the schools of her county, and the cordial comment of the California superintendent of public instruction on this action. Why not start a similar enterprise in your county?

Warning From An Ex-Distiller

If the patrons of the bootleggers do not believe the warnings that are being given them from many men of authority, not the least among whom is Chief Chemist Spear of the Internal Revenue Bureau who declares that in 98 cases out of 100 he who buys liquor from a bootlegger is buying deadly poison, certainly they ought to heed the words of a distiller, now out of business. He says that the first distillation of whisky always contains considerable fusel oil which only later distillation and at least four years in a charred wooden container will remove. Fusel oil, he adds, is a deadly poison which brings horrible results to those who drink it even in minute quantities. As bootleg whisky is in nearly every case the result of a single distillation and never is aged in a charred barrel, no further comment is necessary!

The Real News About Prohibition

What is the real news about prohibition? Is it that a fast set of club men in a big city, gathering for an evening of sport, deliberately and brazenly forget that there is a Volstead Law, and partake freely of illicit liquor? Or is it rather that thousands of men from the factories are every week taking home their wages, spending them for the family and depositing some part in the savings bank, instead of squandering them at the saloon as in ante-prohibition days?

What is the real news about prohibition? Is it that certain lawless, conscienceless men are selling beverages so largely impregnated with poison that there is only one chance in a hundred that they will not cause the death of the one who drinks them? Or is it rather that the past year, the second under prohibition, has been the healthiest year of the United States; that the Washingtonian Home and similar institutions for the treatment of alcoholics, for lack of patronage are compelled to reduce their business to almost the negligible point; and that the ward of Bellevue Hospital, New York, that formerly housed alcoholic cases, is now being used as the children's ward?

What is the real news about prohibition? Is it that men whose appetites for liquor is greater than their love for their nation, are boasting that "their bootleggers" are supplying them as abundantly with liquor as before the Eighteenth Amendment went into operation? Is it not rather that countless young men who in the old days were constantly tempted by the brilliantly illuminated, legalized saloons on every corner, can now walk the streets safe from the invitation to drink?

If the law-loving people were as diligent in talking up the real news about prohibition as are the lawless in talking up the pseudo or false news, it would be far easier to secure enforcement of the law.

Variety of Reasons For Becoming a Member of the W. C. T. U.

As the membership campaign goes on, it will be well to remember that the reasons for joining the W. C. T. U. can be classed under two main headings—the benefits one may get and those which one may give by thus linking oneself up with "organized mother-love." And while it is always "more blessed to give than to receive," one must have in order to give. There will be found, therefore, food for thought and suggestions for the winning of members in the following excerpt taken from the account of the Georgia state W. C. T. U. convention which was sent us by Mrs. August Burghard, state recording secretary:

Comments from different view-points, recall the story of the blind men and the elephant, as recorded in the readers of school days.

A minister coming in at the devotional hour said, "Why, this is a revival service." An authority on business procedure declared, "This convention is a model business meeting." Friends from another state arriving at luncheon remarked, "What a delightful social affair!" An earnest college girl termed it "an inspirational gathering," while to a teacher it was "a school of methods." When the obligation of voting and means for law enforcement were being discussed, a man listening at the door asked, "Is this a political meeting?" A little boy who was enjoying one of the spectacular demonstrations in the evening exclaimed in a stage whisper, "Ain't this a good show!" A new member affirmed, "I found the convention to be educational from beginning to end, I am so glad to belong to such a splendid organization." As the various departmental superintendents pointed out the accomplishments and opportunities along their special lines, a club woman said enthusiastically, "The W. C. T. U. is a combination club—and more." Another claimed that it was "a chautauqua where good music and eloquent lectures on live topics were heard." Each and every comment was correct as far as it went.

Educating Our Foreign-Born

A traveling-man recently wrote his sister:

"A friend of mine has told me of a new way to evade the prohibition law, and it is going to do a lot of harm, especially among the foreign element.

"A certain company put out a 'cooker,' —a very good kitchen utensil, I should think—but it did not find a ready sale. Whereupon the sales force were instructed to speak of the booze-manufacturing ability of the device, but to be careful, in so doing, to have it appear only as an afterthought.

"My friend was on the road for the firm, but when he received these directions he decided that the business was one with which he did not care to be associated, so he sent in his resignation. I have heard that the other salesmen are going out among the foreign-born, making good sales."

This letter is quoted to impress anew the imperative necessity of continuing our educative work among these newcomers. By publicity and by personal work, in particular, we must convince them that all law must be obeyed. With the stress on law observance must go constantly information as to the blessings which come to a nation and to individuals through prohibition of the liquor traffic. There must be an appeal to protective and parental instincts, as well as to the patriotic instinct, which is inherent in people of all nations.

How can we expect, however, that our foreign-born neighbor will feel it incumbent upon him to obey a law which Americans are endeavoring to evade or to violate? Are we reporting not simply the Italian or Greek who disobeys the law by selling "moonshine," but the so-called "respectable citizen" who buys it and laughs at the law? What is our duty?

Prohibition agents throughout the country have been directed to use every effort to check the sale of ingredients and apparatuses used in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors. Attention is also to be given to the advertising of these articles in the newspapers, such advertising being prohibited under the Volstead Act.

To a certain extent, in most of our large cities and in many of the smaller towns, this sale has been going on steadily and openly. Would it not be a good thing for our white-ribboners, when passing a place where such materials are displayed for sale, to make a mental note of the name and location, and report it at once to the nearest prohibition official? When turning the pages of your daily newspaper, glance over the advertisements, and if a prohibited one is seen, clip it, together with the headline giving the name and date of the paper, and forward it to the proper official.

Your report of this particular form of violation of law will show the officers that you are holding up their hands in the battle and that you stand for nothing less than the full observance of the law. After such violations have been noted and reported, your duty is not done until you (or a committee from your union) attend the trial.

The fact that in many places such violations occur so openly, indicates that law-breakers do not fear arrest, conviction and punishment, knowing only too well that the sentiment of the community is in their favor. In other words, the law-abiding part of the community is not doing its full duty.

Is it not time for upright men and women to show that they stand for the enforcement of law? It is they who are directly responsible for the violations that occur, if they do not endeavor to stop them.

Missionaries For Prohibition

Reprinted from The Survey.

The influence of the American experience in the prohibition of alcoholic drink is gradually making itself felt throughout the world. In reply to a recent inquiry from Australia, on its success, 115 chambers of commerce in the United States and Canada reported favorably, 27 unfavorably, and 13 were non-committal. Many foreign visitors in recent months have expressed themselves surprised by the actual results of prohibition as they found them, as these were the opposite of what their papers at home had led them to expect. B. Seebohm Rowntree, the English manufacturer, for instance, said:

"Since I have come to America, I have heard the most extraordinary statements about the terrible results in England of our unemployment insurance act. Of course, to any one living in England and knowing the facts, these stories are rather amusing. They indicate how inadequate is the information which passes from one great country to another.

"For example, our papers are full of the terrible consequences of your prohibition law. We are told of the growing use of drugs, and that an evil much greater than that of drink is growing up in this country. We are told of prisons filled with drunken men and women, and all the rest. Of course, this is rubbish. It was only to be expected that when a tremendous measure such as that came into effect, it would not work smoothly in the first year or two. There is a good deal of infraction and evasion of the law. But on the whole the thing is working with extraordinary success. As I talked with all kinds of employers everywhere in the United States, I found that they are in favor of it and would not go back on any account. I met only two men out of several hundred who held a view contrary to that."

Regierungsrat Dr. Hans Gosler, of the Prussian government, who is in the United States on a short visit, likewise expressed himself to a representative of the Survey as surprised by the effect of prohibition in emptying jails and decreasing the incidence of alcoholism, venereal diseases and other related evils. The impression prevails in Germany, he says, that the prohibition amendment to the Constitution was enacted by the women's vote which, of course, it preceded, in opposition to the desires of the men; and that there is more drunkenness now than there was before. He remarked on the healthy looks of the people and on the ease with which, apparently, the great mass of the population has accustomed itself to a life without alcoholic stimulants.

Sanitaetsrat Dr. B. Laquer, of Wiesbaden, after the recent international anti-alcohol conference at Lausanne, reported in the Frankfurter Zeitung:

"All of the states except New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin and California are 'dry'; but even in these states the breweries, distilleries, liquor stores are closed; drink has disappeared from the railroad stations, billboards and newspapers. No beer truck is to be seen, no ship loads barrels of drink. All this is not American 'bluff,' hypocrisy. The liquor trade, if not dead, is dying. A hidden traffic exists, as it existed here during the war, at prices which the poor cannot afford..... In short, the American people have broken the poison fangs of the snake of alcoholism."

A full documentation on the American experience under prohibition has recently been published by an economist in Cologne.

"Studying the Past and Making Safe the Present"

they have to foot it home again, to await a later opportunity. Some of the people have come from the most primitive environment imaginable. One woman jumped up in class to look out of the window, because, wonder of wonders, a cart was going by and she had never, before coming to school, beheld anything on wheels.

Teachers by the score are needed for the distant out-posts whence such students come. Inquirers are presenting themselves by the hundred and unless they are instructed they will never fully become Christians. In fact, they may fall into a worse condition than before. The importance of education in the missionary enterprise can hardly be overestimated. Interest in the gospel is increasing daily. The help given during the famine has opened many a heart and many a home. Missionaries are often unable to supply evangelists and teachers to the villages that ask for them. Without a vast number of trained Chinese workers, a multitude of seeking souls will be as sheep not having a shepherd.

It is to such schools as I have described that the nation and the church must look for leaders. As an organization, we have a definite part to play in the great program. We must see to it that, so far as possible, the students who go forth to help their fellow-citizens and to train the rising generation are themselves cognizant of the dangers that threaten their country in the shape of narcotic poisons, and to some extent able to combat them with the weapons of truth.

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awakening continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

Prayer

Just begin the day,
With a word of prayer;
Not a corner is so secret
But God's Spirit hovers there.
It will banish gloom and sadness,
Flood the heart with pure delight;
It will fill your day with gladness,
Do you but begin it right.

—Selected.

If the hill back of Nazareth could give back its secret, if the lake of Galilee could tell what it witnessed, if the desert places round about Jerusalem could tell their story, if the Mount of Olives could speak out and tell what transpired there, they would all tell us, more than anything else, of the prayer life of our Lord. They would reveal its intensity, its unselfishness, its constancy, its Godly fear, that made it irresistible.

A Prayer

Lord, I am listening,
Speak thou to me!
Lord, I am weak and blind,
Oh, make me see!
All power in Heaven and earth
Dwelleth in thee.

Lord, I am petulant,
Make me serene!
Give thou me seed to sow,
Though others glean.
Thou art the husbandman,
Full well I ween.

Lord, I am filled with self,
Fill me with love!
Make thou my spirit rise,
Spirit of freedom, thou!
Spirit of Love!

RED LETTER DAYS

March 1—Union Signal Subscription Day. (Birthday of Lillian M. N. Stevens.)
March 20—Prohibition Rally Day (Birthday of General Neal Dow.)

"Hats Off to the Past; Coats Off to the Future"

Myrta E. Lockwood, State Recording Secretary

Oakland county of Michigan is abreast of the times. The executive committee is the law enforcement committee. At a recent meeting of the executive board all officers were present, ten local presidents, two superintendents and the president of the Sixth district. The sheriff was also in attendance and gave a lesson on law enforcement.

A telegram was sent Congressman Fordney protesting against the proposed bonus levy on beer.

A Child Welfare exhibit was ordered to be used throughout the county at a series of mother-child meetings, led by the county president and county Child Welfare director.

A most enthusiastic week, which closed with a one-day institute, was enjoyed at Lake Orion in November. This was of unusual interest. The state corresponding secretary, recording secretary, and treasurer all participated in the program. The district president also was present throughout the day, and the county director of Child Welfare. The music, under the direction of the state musical director, was most spirited. Miss Daisy Hudson, a native of South America, brought a burning message of her country's condition and needs. The vice-consul of Canada was a guest. Local and neighboring pastors aided the county, district, and state officers in making this a truly inspirational institute.

The slogan of this live wire county is

"Hats off to the past;
Coats off to the future."

Kansas City (Kansas) W. C. T. U. Doings

Mrs. Sena Hartzell Wallace, National Organizer and Lecturer

The W. C. T. U. of Kansas City, Kansas, my "home town," is doing its best for the betterment of the community. Not long ago it sent a committee, of which I had the honor to be a member, to ask that a pool hall that had become very obnoxious should be forever closed. Our petition was granted. One individual said, "It won't do you old hens any good. I stand in with the chief of police." He failed to remember that these same "old hens" now wield that mighty weapon, the ballot.

On the same day, while we were listening to the routine business the clerk called our attention to a communication he was about to read from the city clerk of Chicago, asking the commissioners of Kansas City, Kansas, to join with them in striving to secure from the Congress of the United States such a modification of the Volstead Act as would permit the manufacture, sale and distribution of "wholesome" beer and wines. This resolution had been adopted by the city fathers of Chicago.

How did our commissioners receive this communication? With shouts of derision. And laid it on the table.

Our mayor, Hon. Harry C. Burton, said to me, "Mrs. Wallace, that is one of the most perfectly organized schemes in this country. They are sending this resolution to every city in the United States having a population of 25,000 or more; to the governor of the state of Illinois, president of the constitutional convention of the state of Illinois, to the president of the Senate of the United States, and to the speaker of the House of Representatives. It's no time for prohibition folks to be napping."

Although my field work has been sadly curtailed for a year because of illness, for the past two months I have done what I could in my own city. On Prohibition Day I spoke on the Nineteenth Amendment a First Aid to the Eighteenth Amendment; provided a Christmas treat for fifty-one needy children of foreign parents; arranged for proper care for a foreign-born man and wife, both insane. I have been doing personal work in the homes of foreigners and assisted one man in securing his first papers.

In the early winter I was invited by a member of the state board of review of motion pictures to see a film, "Results of Two Years of Prohibition." The wets had made the most of the opportunity to deceive the public. Surely our work is not done. I am glad to state, however, that the film in question has been barred by the Kansas board of review.

AMOS A Model for Modern REFORMERS

We record here the names of friends and comrades who have recently passed to the higher life:

MRS. ALICE DISBROW, president Eighth District W. C. T. U. of Colorado and of Central Union, Denver, the largest in the state, has been suddenly called to higher activities. Mrs. Disbrow believed in the "Do Every Thing" policy and was putting emphasis on increasing L. T. L. and Y. P. B. organizations and promoting Americanization. Her special individual efforts were for law enforcement, and many places were cleaned up because of her efforts. Mrs. Disbrow was an unusual leader because of her optimism, enthusiasm, determination, courage and activity.

MRS. ROSE L. CARLSON of Denver, Colorado, has entered into rest at the age of thirty-seven. Mrs Carlson, as the wife of the first district attorney in the state who made a record on the enforcement of the prohibitive sections of license laws and the first governor under prohibition, had a vital part in moulding the sentiment of the state. The helpmeet of a prominent man, a beautiful mother, a teacher of a young men's Bible class, a white-ribboner and a Christian citizen—the home, society and the state are bereft.

MISS JENNIE STAPLES, of San Diego, California. In the early nineties Miss Staples joined the W. C. T. U. in North Dakota. Coming to California in 1907 she at once identified herself with the white ribbon hosts in her new home, and during the succeeding years served the local, county and state unions in many departments of work. At the time of her translation she was county and local treasurer, state auditor, and state and county representative of THE UNION SIGNAL. Through her efforts San Diego held THE UNION SIGNAL banner of Southern California for many successive years. Faithful till the end, patient, persevering, active—she gave her name, her influence, her service, herself, to carry out God's purposes.

MRS. MARTHA W. LAW, of Los Angeles, California. For years the capable president of the city federation of the W. C. T. U. Mrs. Law was a power for good in civic matters, always in the forefront of any movement along reform lines for justice and right. As state superintendent of the new department of Co-operation between the clubs and the W. C. T. U., she had many plans and was working out a policy of influence well worth while. She had a strong, alert mind and a vigorous personality.

MRS. J. V. PRICE, of Casey, Illinois. Long identified with several women's organizations, Mrs. Price was a leader of recognized ability and was interested in all civic improvements. At the time of her home-going she was county and local president of the W. C. T. U., having filled the latter office for over twenty-five years. Her life was a blessing to the community.

Preaching Prohibition and Law Observance by Posters

W. C. T. U. Exhibit Makes Sentiment

A law enforcement exhibit in one of the banks and a rousing mass meeting are among the latest activities of the Palmer Park (Ill.) W. C. T. U. president, Mrs. W. S. Magers. The meeting was to celebrate the second anniversary of the national prohibition victory, January 16, and was held in St. Stephen's Methodist Church. The Fenger high school orchestra and other local talent furnished music; three ministers gave eloquent addresses on observance of the law and paid fine tributes to the W. C. T. U. Strong testimony to the value of our prohibition law was given by a speaker who had traveled in Europe the past summer, and contrasted the drinking habits in those countries with conditions in the United States. A lawyer gave a spirited talk on law enforcement, deploring the attitude of some of the metropolitan newspapers that he declared were so wet you could "wring beer out of them."

The well arranged law enforcement exhibit attracted much attention and made sentiment for law observance. Not only the Trio Team of the Palmer Park union, but twenty of its members and friends have the weekly UNION SIGNAL. Is it a wonder that it is very much alive?

One-tenth of the Population in The W. C. T. U.

"We have in our local union 135 active members, 25 honoraries, a Young People's Branch of 35 young people, and a Loyal Temperance Legion of 96," writes Mrs. Frank T. Brown, president of the Cairo (Georgia) W. C. T. U. "Cairo, the county seat of Grady county, has only about 2,000 inhabitants. We entertained the state convention last fall and had a fine meeting. We carry on twenty-two departments of work in our union and have a standard of efficiency for our local superintendents. Each superintendent has a committee and every member of the union is on one of these committees. We had public programs on Armistice Day, Thanksgiving day and January 16. We meet in the homes once a month and have a program, business and social hour.

California Women Place Law Enforcement Cards in School Room Windows

To a Woodland (California) woman came the happy thought of having the "white star" law observance cards given to all the schools of Yolo county, on February 12, in honor of Abraham Lincoln's birthday. The civic clubs, with the aid of the women of the churches, did the distributing. Before ordering the cards, the enterprising clubwoman wrote to Mr. Will C. Wood, California's superintendent of Public Instruction, in regard to the plan, and he replied:

"I can see no objection whatever to the circulation in the public schools of the 'white star' window cards. It seems to me that it is highly desirable that we call upon our young people to serve America and support the Constitution."

A little leaflet given out with these window cards explains their meaning and purpose in the following words:

"Faithfulness in citizenship. As the silver star is the symbol of service in the Army and Navy, the gold star, the symbol of life given for Country, so the white star is a symbol of life lived in faithful civic service as an American citizen. 'Peace hath her victories no less than War.'

"Its purpose: To help to lessen the wave of crime sweeping over our country in common with the whole civilized world, because of lack of reverence for law."

Dr. P. S. Bourdeau-Sisco, national W. C. T. U. superintendent of the department of Health, has been appointed as the representative of the National W. C. T. U. on the Women's Advisory Council to the United States Public Health Service.

A meeting of this Council is to be held March 1-2 at Washington, D. C., in the library of the Division of Venereal Diseases. Among the distinguished people who will participate in this conference are Dr. Hugh S. Cumming, surgeon-general, Dr. A. J. McLaughlin, C. C. Pierce, Dr. J. W Schereschewsky, Dr. B. S. Warren, Dr. R. H. Creel, Dr. C. H. Lavinder, assistant surgeons-general, Dr. Rachelle S. Yarros, special consultant, Dr. Valeria H. Parker, executive secretary of the Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board, and national W. C. T. U. director of Social Morality.

Why Not In Every Community a Meeting Like This?

A record-breaking audience, composed of representative men and women filled the large auditorium of the New McKendree Methodist church, Jackson, Mo., Sunday afternoon, January 15, at a rousing patriotic and law enforcement meeting, presided over by Miss Roena E. Shauer, vice-president of the Missouri W. C. T. U.

This was a great co-operative gathering of representatives of every organization which stands for the uplift of humanity. As one entered the door, the eye was attracted by the large motto, "Talk-Work-Vote for Law Enforcement," and a flag-draped poster, "Stand by the Flag and the Constitution."

Delightful musical numbers were rendered by the union choir and the high school chorus. Stirring addresses emphasizing the necessity of law enforcement and ringing appeals for the hearty co-operation of all good people to this end, were made by some of the leading men and women of the city.

Strong resolutions condemning law violation and pledging hearty support to officials in the performance of their duty were unanimously adopted by a rising vote. A local law enforcement league was organized.

Important Ruling For Iowa

The throwing open of the Federal prohibition records of the state of Iowa for inspection and use, was a victory over which the W. C. T. U. is rejoicing. Mr. John B. Hammond of the sheriff's office appealed to the state W. C. T. U. for help, and the state president corresponded with Federal Prohibition Commissioner Haynes in regard to the matter. It finally went to the courts but was settled out of court. Commissioner Haynes ruled that the Federal prohibition director was authorized at any time to open his records to state, county and municipal officers. Permission was also given to peace officers to make transcripts of all liquor licenses issued by the Federal office and of all liquor purchases made by the owners of these licenses. The ruling is highly important as it gives county officers access to evidence hitherto unobtainable.

"Greater Liberty for a Greater Number"

Victory Day was observed by the W. C. T. U. of Denver with a banquet at the Adams Hotel, Central union being the hostess and the president, Mrs. Alice E. Disbrow, toastmistress. Attorney General Victor E. Keyes, Prof. Jesse H. Newlon, superintendent of schools, Mr. Ralph Lindstrom, assistant attorney for the D. & R. G. Railroad, and Mrs. Adrianna Hungerford, president of the state W. C. T. U., each presented some phase of law enforcement. The Yeager Quartette furnished the music. Some of the points made were: "Amendments are adopted to promote the general welfare of the country." "License is taken away so there may be greater liberty for a greater number of people." "There is more need of patriotism in time of peace than in time of war." "Law enforcement is an insurance of stability in business." "Law is to obey, not to evade."

Philadelphia Business Men Form League for Law Enforcement

Aroused by the violation of prohibition in Philadelphia, and the apparent laxity in enforcing the law, a small group of men who hold prominent positions in the banking, commercial and industrial circles of the city, recently met and discussed the problem. They went to Washington in a body and laid the whole matter before Attorney General Daugherty, who agreed to throw the support of his department into the breach to clean up the city.

Upon their return from Washington these men decided to go still further in the matter, and have organized a Law Enforcement League, the purpose of which, as quoted by the Philadelphia North American, "is to establish a strong and influential body of representative business men, who will fearlessly and openly stand before the public in demanding the enforcement of the Volstead act and protecting the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States."

Those who have been instrumental in the inception of the organization feel "confident that all citizens who believe in civic righteousness and obedience to established law will become members of this league and will demand of public officials the enforcement of the established laws of our government, and thus furnish protection to the people and their homes."

Not Self-Enforcing

Prohibition can not be expected to enforce itself; nor can it be expected to succeed by half-way, weak-hearted administrative efforts.—Chicago (Ill.) Eagle,

"In our town we are very much disturbed from the sale of Extracts that contain alcohol, particularly the sale to those addicted to the alcohol habit. Having seen your 'Ad' in the Union Signal, I told a merchant about it in our town. He has agreed to carry goods of this kind, provided it will pay him to handle it.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

Unused Power

"One of the big things about the late world war was the bringing to light and the development of unsuspected energy and ability among the American youth," says Ellen Friel Baker in The Classmate.

"At the call to arms, many young men and women awoke to the fact that they possessed strength, courage and efficiency whose germs they did not even suspect were hidden in their natures.

"It is astonishing how this sudden awakening came in answer to a call from a crushed and bleeding nation, and it impresses the following facts forcefully upon us:

"First—Society is full of undeveloped or partially developed personalities—people who have never given full expression to their powers or unfolded the best that is in them.

"Second—If people believed more in their own mental and spiritual resources they would undoubtedly make more out of their lives.

"Third—No great crisis ever called in vain for men of courage, self-sacrifice and genius.

"These attributes, however, should be brought to light by impulses from within and should not be dependent upon outward conditions. We should put forth the best that is in us at all times, as a matter of self-loyalty and helpfulness. We should believe in ourselves—know ourselves to be full of the germs of highest growth, and not wait for some bugle blast of distress to call forth our best service to the world."

Making Money For the Kingdom of God

When Dr. C. E. Welch of the Welch Grape Juice Company was graduated many years ago from a medical college, he intended to go as a missionary to Africa, but his father died at about that time and the grape juice business was threatened with dissolution unless he took charge of the concern. After giving the question of his duty in the matter very serious consideration he changed his plans and went into the business with his whole heart, devoting his energies and talents to making money for the Kingdom of God. Dr. Welch and his four fine sons make up the Welch Grape Juice Company. They are all deeply interested in Christian and moral reform enterprises. Dr. Welch has given away hundreds of thousands of dollars to Christian work, and it is said that he has supported a dozen or more missionaries in Africa, thus helping to carry the gospel to that needy country and by substitutes fulfilling the ambitions of his young manhood.

"Thank You" For My Y. P. B. Experience, Writes Friend From Chile, South America

(The writer is a teacher in the Institute Ingles, Santiago, Chile)

The Ohio Young People's Branch is the most efficient medium of temperance service I know. And I mean "efficient" in a true sense: it accomplishes the greatest possible results for the energy expended.

As a training school, the study course books gave me the information I needed to convince our victorious track team, in this school in Chile, that smoking, drinking and impurity are not conducive to good athletics. The same source gave me live illustrations that hold the interest of a physiology class, made up of boys, who for the most part, were raised with wine before them at every meal.

Personally the Y. P. B. has given me an attitude of positive opposition to things intrinsically evil, and one of the fairest possible judgment but of the strictest dealing with things made evil by association and circumstance. The ideals of the Y. P. B., as I found them interpreted by Ohio's young people, and backed by their Christian spirit, are as high as can be found. A most delightful and encouraging feature of those ideals is the spirit of true happiness and good cheer which proves the Y. P. B. is not simply "good"—it is good for something.

Socially, the Y. P. B. has aided me greatly in choosing companions with clean habits and high ideals, an invaluable boon, especially in this country where the people have such great odds against which to struggle in raising their moral standards. Through the Y. P. B. I have met and formed lasting friendships with people who not only glory in making their lives a living sacrifice for the Master, but are actually accomplishing wonders in service for His children.

I have only one regret in my Y. P. B. experience—that I did not put more effort and enthusiasm into the organization. It has paid a manifold return for all energy expended. My one word of warning to my Y. P. B. friends is that an initial effort was and always will be necessary to produce any result.

With sincere thanks to the mother organization, the W. C. T. U., for its kind advice and counsel, and to the Y. P. B. for its standards which I have made my own, I remain

A loyal Y. P. B. member.

Did You Ever Write Your Autobiography?

A former pupil of Frances E. Willard tells of one of the subjects that was assigned to her in her composition class—the writing of her autobiography. "I realize now, as I could not then, what an inspiration it was—this 'analysis'; as by means of it our teacher learned just what she wanted to know of each pupil, her bringing-up, her environment, the influences that were making her what she was, all to be a guide and help in bringing out the best in each one." The analysis is as follows:

1. My parents—items of their history.
2. Myself
   a. When and where born
   b. Anecdotes of my infancy and childhood
   c. My personal appearance at this period
   d. My disposition at this period
   e. My home
   f. Inmates of the home
   g. My early sports
3. School-life
   a. Place
   b. Teachers
   c. Pupils—my favorite
   d. Plays at school
4. Miscellanies
5. What I am
6. What I hope to be.

The Best Seller! Are You Reading It?

Of "Main Street," there have been sold 260,000 copies in a year and a half. The sales of "This Side of Paradise" ran up to nearly one hundred thousand. The works of the Rev. Harold Bell Wright used to sell, probably still sell, above a half-million.

These are large figures. But the American Bible Society announces that in 1921 it distributed more than four million Bibles; and in spite of industrial depression, the effects of the war on private morality, and all the other factors that might be expected to handicap sales, it sent out 380,000 more Bibles in 1921 than in the previous year.

There are plenty of best sellers, but there is only one best seller. It is astounding to learn that "Robinson Crusoe" has been translated into nearly a hundred languages and dialects; it is not even remarkable that the Bible has been issued in 333, from Arabic to Zapotec and Zulu, whatever Zapotec may be.

The Bible is interesting as history, fascinating as literature, and fundamental for civilization.

Knowledge of the Bible is the basis of a knowledge of good style; and anybody ignorant of it, be he the most sincere infidel or the most devout Buddhist, is ignorant indeed.

The Enemy

Frances S. Hallowes

(The S. S. "Persia" is bound for India, having among its passengers Major Orde and Bertram Harford, who have become acquainted with a Mrs. Carlyle, her small son, Eric, and Angela O'Connor, who, in the charge of Mrs. Carlyle, is on her way to marry a Deputy Commissioner at Seraneb. Harford, who is a total abstainer, is glad to note that Angela refuses to drink, and the two become good friends. Consequently, Harford is much shocked to learn that Angela has been induced by Mrs. Carlyle to take some whisky for seasickness and has been overcome by the liquor. Through pity for her he breaks his reticence on the subject, and tells her that both his parents were victims of drink, and that he had promised his mother on her deathbed never to touch alcohol in any form. Angela admits that she has made her mother a similar promise, but does not mention any particular reason therefor.)

CHAPTER III.

As is usual on P. and O. boats, there was a small committee of men on the "Persia" who promoted sports and amusements for the entertainment of the passengers. Harford was a leading spirit. His fine physical development, and his University training in athletics, soon made him the observed of all. He won all the events where strength, endurance, speed and sight were in demand.

It was not long, however, before he found that though more than a match for any man on board, he was also an object of jealousy, and he determined to fall out of the competitions. He was too generous to wish to out-distance his fellow-passengers. His modesty turned aside the women's compliments at his prowess, with a laughing "Oh, it is nothing. I have had an extra good training, and keep myself in form: that is the secret."

Several men, among whom was Major Orde, were smoking and enjoying their pegs, when one, a tall, fair man, with a large moustache, turned to him, and said,

"That fellow Harford shares your cabin, does he not, Major?"

"Yes: a good chum I find him."

"A queer kind of chum for you, I should say. Does not smoke or drink, does he?"

"No: he calls himself an abstainer."

"Infernally superior sort of chap," chimed in a short, rather stout man, with flabby cheeks, puckered all over with innumerable wrinkles of a faint yellow tint.

"Yes, I hate that sort of Pharisee," said the first speaker.

"He is not a Pharisee, even though he is an abstainer," replied Major Orde, quietly.

"Well, I mean one of those fellows who disapprove of ordinary gentlemanly habits."

"He certainly disapproves of drinking and he has some good reasons, too," said the Major. "If I were a younger man perhaps I would give up my pegs."

"Ha, ha, ha," laughed the other two "not you, Major! Fancy life without a drop of whisky!"

"We should all be stronger and healthier, no doubt. Efficiency is the cry now me boys, and it will increase as time goes on. Perhaps one of the qualifications for the army in the future will be total abstinence. You young fellows had better look out!"

"Hullo! Major! you turning temperance lecturer."

"Facts are stubborn things, me boy. won't give Harford an inch in his arguments against drink, but I ask you, there a man on board to be compared with him in physical development?"

The two men grudgingly assented.

"He is a cricket 'Blue,' you know continued Major Orde. "Why are at letes bound to abstain while in training, if alcohol is a food or a tonic, as we are so fond of calling it? No, me boys, I take my peg as a luxury; I'm under no delusion of whisky being necessary to my health; I like it and I take it, that is the whole story."

"Come now, Major, you'd feel pretty low without it."

"True, me boy, and I've not the pluck to try the experiment; but if I had boys, I'd just knock off strong drink from their diet."

"And how about your wife?"

"I'm not married and don't intend to be; but if I had a wife, I would like her to be an abstainer."

His friends laughed. "You'd find it difficult to find one: not many to select from, anyhow."

"A drunken woman is the most loathsome sight on God's earth," continued the Major. "It's a hellish wreck that of a woman—think of the heredity to children! I can't deny myself the sensual gratification of drink, but I don't mean to hand on the taste for it to others."

The men laughed and stared at the Major. This little bit of his inward philosophy amused them, but none the less it impressed them for the time. They ceased to scoff at Harford.

That evening little Eric Carlyle lay in his berth, watching his mother dress for dinner. He chattered about "Muvver's pitty sings," as she put on her rings, bracelets and chains.

He watched her narrowly while she dabbed her face with powder, touched up her eyes with kohol, and her cheeks with spots of rouge.

Then she turned to him, and said, "Now, Eric darling, go to sleep; Mummy will soon be back."

"I'se so thirsty, Muvver."

"Thirsty! well, here is water." She handed him a tumbler, and he drained it. She laid him down and covered him: then taking the tumbler, placed it on a table. She then went to her dressing-bag, and took from it a bottle of whisky. Eric's bright eyes followed her.

Pouring out a little, she added water and drank it off.

"What's in that big bottle, Muvver?"

"Oh, that is Muvver's medicine."

"Give Eric some."

"No; go to sleep, boy," and she kissed him, and was gone.

Eric was restless: he turned over and over, his sheets slipped away. He was flushed, and still thirsty.

He climbed out of his berth to look for "drink."

There was the tumbler, the whisky bottle and the water carafe. The latter was almost empty.

"Muvver's medicine; very good. Eric take some."

He climbed onto a box and reached the whisky bottle. It was heavy for his small hands, the cork was only lightly slipped in: he took it out easily. Then with two hands, very carefully he poured out about a third of a tumbler, but a lurch coming suddenly, this was added to very considerably; then he added the water, as he had seen his mother do.

Consumed with thirst, he drank it up greedily, as he had done with the water earlier. He shrieked out, "It burns!" then reeled and fell. His golden head struck the edge of the box.

He was injured, dazed by the blow. The whisky quickly produced unconsciousness in his tender brain. There he lay in his white gown, breathing heavily; minutes passed, and his respiration became more labored. No mother came to his help. She had been claimed by a bridge party; if she thought of the child, it was as asleep in his berth. No presentiment of evil stirred in her. Well fed, well primed with pegs, absolutely satisfied with herself, she laughed and joked over her bridge, highly delighted at her gains.

The Big Ten

Della F. Withers, Circulation Manager.

During January the ten states leading in number of subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL in most instances made a gain. Iowa jumped ahead of Indiana and Wisconsin took New Jersey's place.

Illinois added to her list 110 weekly and 48 monthly new subscribers, but she did not watch the renewals closely enough so there were 90 weekly and 13 monthly discontinuances.

Wisconsin placed on her list 110 weekly and 59 monthly "subs" and had only 59 weekly and 13 monthly discontinuances. Wisconsin made the greatest gain of all the states.

Some states put on more subscriptions than the states named, but more were taken off than put on.

Recipe For Renewing Youth

"To the wife, mother and home-maker of middle-age, suffrage offers both a satisfying outlet for her energies and a golden opportunity to serve her community," says Anna Steese Richardson. "Properly guided she will reduce local politics to municipal house-keeping—and the average town stands in sad need of efficient household management. Attend any working convention of women interested in community service, municipal government or national politics, and you will find that 90 per cent of the leaders, workers and inspirational figures are women past forty. The ballot and what it will get for her community represent not only an opportunity of service but the chance for the middle-aged woman to renew her youth by expressing herself along new and progressive lines."

Lawlessness Must Be Eliminated

TO give conscious, practical, whole-hearted, unwavering obedience to this law, is the duty of every good citizen---every man who has more regard for the flag than for his appetite; every man who is willing to hold his own desires in restraint in order that the general good of the country may be advanced; every man who has in truth highly resolved "that this government of the people, for the people and by the people, shall not perish from the earth."

RECLASSIFICATION BILL IN HANDS OF SENATE—ASSISTANT PROHIBITION COMMISSIONER APPOINTED—FILM CENSORSHIP BILL INTRODUCED—SOLDIER BONUS STILL UNSETTLED — APPROPRIATION BILLS PROGRESSING

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

Reclassification Bill in Hands of Senate

The Reclassification bill has been reported by Senator Sterling from the Senate Civil Service Committee as a substitute for the Lehlbach Reclassification bill, recently passed by the House. The formal report to the Senate of this bill, proposing the reclassification of civil employees of the government and the equalization and standardization of their pay, marks another important advance towards enactment of a long-needed law. It has been a reproach to the government that hundreds of its most faithful, cultured, highly educated and technically trained employees have been among those most inadequately paid for their services. In many of the bureaus of the different departments, in the Library of Congress and in places of specialized work, men and women from leading colleges and universities, speaking several languages and performing duties involving a life-time of consecration, have been working on a scale of pay below that earned, in times like these, by untrained laborers.

A number of important amendments were written into the bill, and Senator Sterling announced that today he would file a comprehensive report which would fully explain the measure to the Senate. In accordance with an agreement reached at the time the bill was introduced it was sent to the Appropriations Committee for a report on the salary schedules only.

As reported to the Senate the bill provides for increased pay above that fixed by the House for the scientific and professional employees of the government. Instead of the Bureau of the Budget being designated as the classifying agency, as in the House bill, the Civil Service Commission is placed in charge of that duty, but is required to consult with the heads of the departments in that respect.

An important provision of the bill would direct the Bureau of the Budget to study the whole subject of government employment with reference to the number and qualifications required to enable the several departments to perform their functions under the law. The Budget Bureau also is directed to investigate the question with reference to the cost of living and to determine what adjustments, if any, may be found to be advisable. This information must be transmitted to Congress with recommendations for any needed changes.

An Assistant Prohibition Commissioner

The Treasury Appropriation bill, which carried the amendment making possible the concentration of bonded liquors in fewer warehouses, has been signed by the President.

Mr. Millard F. West, formerly Deputy Commissioner of Internal Revenue in charge of accounts, has been appointed by Major Haynes as Assistant Prohibition Commissioner. Mr. West will have charge of the problems connected with the concentration of bonded liquors.

The general plan of the prohibition unit is to concentrate as far as possible in a limited number of storehouses the distilled spirits now in bonded warehouses scattered throughout the country.

Fifty Federal Directors Will Be Placed, Mr. Haynes Says

Reorganization of the national prohibition field forces is expected to be completed soon with a total of fifty Federal prohibition directors, Commissioner Haynes recently announced.

The commissioner said a director would be appointed for the Canal Zone, rounding out the total. Consideration is now being given to the selection of an official for the post. The Willis-Campbell Act extended the national prohibition enforcement area to both the Canal Zone and the Virgin Islands.

Film Censorship Bill Introduced

Representative Appleby of New Jersey has introduced a bill creating a new division of the United States Bureau of Education, to be known as the Federal Motion Picture Commission. The bill states that the act may be cited as the Motion Picture Censorship Act. It provides not only for censorship of all films, but also for inquiry and research into the reactional and educational possibilities of motion pictures and dissemination of such information to the public.

In a statement given to the press in regard to his bill, Mr. Appleby said: "There is little doubt in the minds of the majority of the people of this country familiar with motion pictures and the motion picture industry of the desirability and necessity for the immediate establishment of a censorship of motion picture films. The continued action of certain producers in presenting objectionable films makes it imperative."

The bill was referred to the Committee on Education and Mr. Appleby stated that it was his intention to ask for hearings at the earliest possible date.

Appropriation Bills Progressing

Commerce and Labor Bill Carries Appropriation for Women's Bureau and Maternity and Infancy Act

The Legislative bill, carrying $12,490,000 for the expenses of Congress next year, has been passed by the Senate and sent to conference. It was the fourth of the regular supply measures to pass both branches of Congress. The Treasury and Independent Offices Interior Department Appropriation bills have been signed by the President. The Commerce and Labor Appropriation bill has passed the House and gone to the Senate. This bill carried an appropriation of $75,000 for the Women's Bureau and the appropriation of $240,000 for the year beginning July, 1922, to carry out the provisions of the Maternity and Infancy Act.

The House, by an overwhelming vo of 280 to 36, extended until June 3 1923, the 3 per cent restrictive immigr tion law.

Soldier Cash Bonus Problem St Unsolved

The situation in Congress in respect the soldier bonus recalls the Irishman description of his sick father's conditio it's "getting no better fast".

Petitions for and against reach t legislators' desks. The cash bonus, is declared by many, is an attempt appraise patriotic service in terms dollars and cents, with the result of d moralizing the public spirit of the nati by distributing hundreds, even thousand of millions of dollars as a gratuity, a that, if the money were at hand wi which to make this distribution, t proposal would be highly objectionat on the ground of public policy.

Bonus other than cash—land, paid insurance, or educational advantages is now being advocated by many.

Discussion of Proposed "Equal Righ Amendment

The proposed Blanket "Equal Right Amendment to the Federal Constituti advocated by the National Woma Party, is to be the subject of discussi at an all-day Sunday conference h which has been called by the Natio Trade Women's League. There will present women trade unionists of ma occupations, representing many lal organizations.

The Trade Union League announced a statement today that the League lieves that the proposed Blanket Ame ment "will interfere with existing l which we have worked for years to cure."

The resolution has not yet been in duced in Congress, but announcem was made several months ago t Senator Curtis of Kansas and Repres ative Fess of Ohio would at a later d introduce this resolution. The orig draft of the bill proposed removing legal, civil and political disabilities women.

Bill to Retire Emergency Officers Pa Senate

The Bursum bill, giving disal emergency officers of the American peditionary forces the same retirem privileges as regular Army officers, passed yesterday by the Senate, 50 t and transmitted to the House.

To secure the benefits of the bill, abled officers would be required to h a disability of at least 30 per cent u the war risk law standards. The th fourths retirement pay and allowa would be in lieu of war risk allowar The cost next year to the governm was estimated at $5,000,000.

DIRE DISASTERS DUE TO DRY REGIME

(The Association Against the Prohibition Amendment has recently published a list of evils which have befallen our nation through the enactment of the prohibitory law. According to this and like organizations and individuals, prohibition has increased crime, caused fatal accidents, hurt labor conditions, and affected property. The statistics which follow will show how true are these statements.)

"PROHIBITION CAUSES CRIME" A survey of law and order conditions prevailing in San Francisco in 1921, as compared with 1916, the last year in which no prohibition ordinance was in effect, shows that there were nearly 10,000 more arrests for drunkenness in 1916. The population of the jails in the same year averaged 3,984, while in 1921 they had decreased by almost 1500, averaging 2,508. According to the chief of police, Daniel O'Brien, the policing of the city is noticeably easier since prohibition went into effect, and general law and order conditions have shown a marked improvement. Prohibition has checked all kinds of crime.

"PROHIBITION HAS CAUSED DEATH BECAUSE OF BAD LIQUOR" "In connection with the deaths under prohibition," says an exchange, "it is well to remember that before the passage of the dry act alcoholism killed more than 500 persons each year in New York City alone, while in 1920 only 90 succumbed from this cause in Gotham, and but 86 last year. This is a tremendous saving of precious lives, and is due entirely to prohibition."

The New York Times says that wood alcohol rolled up a formidable list of casualties before prohibition was ever thought of, and cites the "epidemic" of 1905 when there were a hundred or so cases of such poisoning in the neighborhood of Tenth Avenue. Insanity, blindness and death came upon the drinkers of the "pink Elephant" brand of booze. Twenty-five fatalities were officially reported, and the actual number was probably much greater.

"PROHIBITION HAS AFFECTED LABOR CONDITIONS" Prohibition has "affected labor conditions." An Indiana contractor was recently visiting in Miami, Florida, where he was questioned on prohibition. The Miami press quotes his statement: "It is a fact that since prohibition made it more difficult to get liquor, all of my men report for duty on time Monday mornings. Before prohibition I could not count on more than two-thirds of them for Monday, because the other third were sleeping off Sunday drunks. And I have noticed that under prohibition the families of my employees are better taken care of. They have better food and wear better clothes. So as far as I am concerned I would not want liquor sold again in this country, just for common sense business reasons."

The Federal Comptroller in his annual report states that there is more money saved, and more people are saving than ever before.

Another witness to the effect on labor conditions is Mr. John B. Campbell of the Campbell Paper Box Company, South Bend, Indiana, who is quoted by the Board of Temperance of the Methodist Episcopal Church as saying that prohibition has brought about a gain of at least ten per cent in industrial efficiency.

Direct Benefits of Prohibition

Six direct benefits of prohibition were briefly and clearly outlined by the secretary of the Dry Maintenance League of Cleveland, Ohio, in his annual report. They are:

(1) Deaths from alcoholism have decreased.
(2) Many workhouses and jails have been closed.
(3) Drunkenness has decreased.
(4) Condition of children has bettered and there are fewer cases of cruelty. Children are better clothed and better fed.
(5) Annual increase in insanity has been checked, and the scale turned downward.
(6) Increases in bank and savings deposits were largest in years.

"AUTOMOBILE ACCIDENTS HAVE MULTIPLIED" The secretary-manager of the St. Louis safety-council stated in a recent report that during the first ten months of 1921 there had been a decrease of 131 in fatal accidents in St. Louis, as compared with 1920. In 1920 there were 83 deaths from motor vehicles; in 1921 only 79 in spite of an increase of several thousand automobilists.

In Philadelphia, 232 persons were killed by automobiles in 1920, while up to the last of November, 1921, 170 deaths from the same cause were reported. The reduction of deaths, says superintendent of police Mills, is due to many causes, chief among them, the drive against drunken motorists, so that many motorists who were disposed to drive their machines in a reckless manner or operate the cars while under the influence of alcoholic beverages have refrained from doing so.

"PROHIBITION HAS INTERFERED WITH PROPERTY" A correct statement! Prohibition has interfered with property in that it has increased the value of real estate, as will be freely admitted by anyone who has seen a neighborhood changed from a bad section to a respectable part of the city. According to the results of the investigations made and published by the New York Herald and the Philadelphia Ledger recently, the closing of 74 distilleries, 669 breweries, and approximately 177,890 saloons did not cause any property loss. Practically all of the properties were taken over immediately by other lines of business and many of them are yielding more revenue today than when they were occupied for the manufacture and sale of intoxicants. In Peoria, Illinois, for example, thirteen large distilleries were at once taken over by a large food corporation and transformed, employing four thousand people in place of the one thousand employed during the regime of the liquor traffic. In New York saloons have been changed to lunch rooms, drug stores, cigar stores, automobile supply houses, and so on, with no property loss.

The president of the Stamper-Meyer Grocery Company at Benton, Illinois, states that in the last year there have been built in that city alone over seven hundred homes, probably eighty per cent by people who are to live in them, a large portion of whom would have spent this money in saloons. Many business men of the state say that real estate values have increased, not only the saloon buildings, but the property adjacent to the saloons having become more valuable.

A most interesting statement comes from J. C. Nichols, recognized nationally as an authority on city development, who is quoted by the Kansas City, Missouri, Post, as calling the attention of the Kansas City plan commission to a "most vital factor confronting city builders." The revamping of future city plans is all a result of the changes in night life following prohibition, Mr. Nichols contends. The suburban business is being built up, and the final result will be a city topography dotted with offsprings of the main business district, and checked off with traffic-ways that are absolutely essential. Consequently, these factors are being taken into account by the city plan commissioners, who "are praying that a repeal of the amendment will not occur to change blue prints now being made for future Kansas City."

"PROHIBITION CAUSES ILLICIT TRAFFIC" In the year 1908 Louisville, Kentucky, as shown by the city records, had 903 licensed saloons. In the same year the Louisville Herald quoted the chairman of the board of public safety as saying, "A list of some 400 places where intoxicants are sold without licenses has been prepared by the city attorney's office at the request of the license board, and against these proprietors war will be waged." Although there are now no licensed saloons, the official figures of arrests for drunkenness would show that the number of illicit places had also greatly lessened. In the year ending June 30, 1920, there were only 412 arrests for this cause.

Spain and Iceland

The International Temperance Bureau has just forwarded to the Spanish Government an address to the King of Spain, in which the policy of reprisals practiced by Spain with regard to Norway, and especially to Iceland, is criticised. The address points out to what an extent the Spanish policy, inspired solely by economic motives, is prejudicial to the fight against alcoholism, and how it strikes at the same time at the imprescriptible right of all nations, small or great, to settle independently, looking solely to the interests of public health, all questions concerning hygiene and in particular the fight against alcoholism. This address was signed by about 400 eminent personalities of the following countries: France, Italy, Belgium, Austria, Switzerland, Holland, Germany, Esthonia, Czecho-Slovakia, Jugoslavia, Finland, Sweden, the United States of America. The American signatories number a hundred, amongst them prominent parliamentary and industrial personalities.

United States Senator Jones introduced in the Senate on February 2, a resolution disapproving the pressure exerted by the Spanish Government on Iceland and Norway.

[EDITOR'S NOTE: There is reported to have been a prolongation of the trade treaty between Spain and Iceland whereby the latter's prohibitory law is safeguarded.]

PROHIBITION PROGRESS AS PORTRAYED BY SOME DECISIONS OF THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT

Arranged by National Legislative Superintendent, Lenna Lowe Yost

TRANSPORTATION

Wilkerson v. Rahrer (140 U. S. 545)

On May 25, 1891, the Court handed down a decision, sustaining an Act of Congress, known as the Wilson Act, which provided that liquors transported into a state for use in the state are subject to the existing laws of the state whether in the original package or otherwise.

LABELING LIQUOR SHIPMENTS

United States v. Freeman (239 U. S. 117)

November 15, 1915, the Court upheld the Act of Congress, requiring that all shipments of liquor be plainly marked on the outside, showing contents of shipment, purpose for which to be used, and the name of consignor and consignee.

INTER-STATE TRANSPORTATION

Clark Distilling Company v. Western Maryland and Express Companies and the State of West Virginia (242 U. S. 311)

January 8, 1917, the Court sustained the Webb-Kenyon Act. This removed the illegal shipment of intoxicating liquors from the protection of the interstate transportation clause of the Constitution and gave the states the right to prohibit shipments of intoxicating liquor into the state from outside.

POSSESSION

Crane v. Campbell (245 U. S. 304)

December 10, 1917, the United States Supreme Court held that the state had a right to prohibit possession of intoxicating liquors for any purpose and to prohibit the use of compounds or tablets from which intoxicating liquors might be made.

TWO-THIRDS VOTE

Missouri Pacific Railway Company v. The State of Kansas (248 U. S. 276)

January 7, 1919, the Court handed down a decision in which it ruled that a two-thirds vote of Congress, necessary to pass a bill over the President's veto, means a two-thirds vote of a quorum present and voting and not necessarily a two-thirds vote of the members elected.

On the same date the Court reaffirmed its decision sustaining the constitutionality of the Webb-Kenyon Act.

TRANSPORTATION

United States v. Dan Hill (248 U. S. 420)

January 13, 1919, the Court held that the Reed Amendment prohibited a person from carrying liquors into a prohibition state for his own use, even though the law of the state permitted such transportation of liquors.

WAR PROHIBITION

Hamilton v. Kentucky Distillers (251 U. S. 146)

December 15, 1919, the Court in an unanimous decision upheld the war prohibition law. Two cases were involved; one appealed from the District Court of Kentucky by Elwood Hamilton, where the case against the Kentucky distillers was lost, and a case appealed from the District Court of New York by Alphons Dryfoos and others v. William Edwards, Collector of Internal Revenue, in which case the law was sustained.

DEFINITION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS

Ruppert v. Caffey (251 U. S. 264)

January 5, 1920, the Court held that Congress had the power to define intoxicating liquors and fix the standard of per cent permissible under the Eighteenth Amendment.

TRANSPORTATION

United States v. Simpson (252 U. S. 465)

May 6, 1920, the Court reaffirmed its decision that a person cannot transport liquor, even for his own use. The case involved transportation in an automobile from one state to another in violation of the Reed Amendment.

REFERENDUM

Hawke v. Smith (253 U. S. 221)

June 1, 1920, the Court handed down a decision declaring that the action of state legislatures is sufficient to ratify an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The referendum provisions of state constitutions or statutes have no application.

EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT AND VOLSTEAD ACT

Rhode Island v. Palmer (253 U. S. 350)

June 7, 1920, the Court upheld the validity of the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act. Validity of the prohibition amendment and portions of the enforcement act were involved in seven separate proceedings before the Supreme Court. Two of these were original suits brought by Rhode Island and New Jersey as sovereign states to enjoin enforcement in their jurisdiction upon the grounds that both enactments were unconstitutional. The other cases were direct appeals from lower court decisions.

In all the cases a general attack on the amendment was made on the ground that it was revolutionary and was really legislation in the guise of a constitutional amendment designed to regulate the private habits of individuals; that it interfered with the state's police powers; that it was invalid because adopted by two-thirds of the members of Congress present when the vote was taken and not by two-thirds of the entire membership.

From Bar to Chapel

N. S. Bowen

The most interesting relic of ante-prohibition days that has ever come under my notice is to be found in a beautiful little chapel in Montgomery, Alabama.

There was a time when this important city boasted some of the most elegant and costly bar fittings in the south. The great bevelled mirrors, reflecting in their crystal clearness all the sordid effects of the liquor traffic's workings; the broad, heavy counters of solid mahogany; the highly polished and exquisitely carved slot machines all added to the pride of their owners.

But there came a day when all this splendor was as so much useless rubbish, cumbering up space. What was to be done with it? Suddenly it seemed to have lost its value. There was no place in which it might find a use.

Since it must be moved it was torn away, the sound of the workmen's tools bearing a ringing testimony to the nation's forward step.

The mahoganies and mirrors were carted to an old warehouse and forgotten. But business did not allow them to remain in that oblivion. The city was growing; its business section was expanding. So with the sale of the warehouse its contents were again brought to light, dragged out, and piled in confusion in a deserted stable yard.

Then one day an old cabinet maker, with an artist's creative imagination, realized the possibilities of the discard and it was bought and again moved, this time to join an odd assortment of rare rosewood and ebony, bits of ivory inlays and teak—and from the ruins of their former shapes things of beauty and dignity began to emerge.

When the old man spoke of his work, and especially of the chapel pulpit, it was with an affectionate, almost a reverent tenderness. And well he might be proud of the exquisite pulpit, standing beneath the stained glass window at the eastern end of the chapel, for as the morning sun glorified it, the eyes of the Good Shepherd seemed to smile on the shining mahogany which had risen from its former low estate to this high place of service before His face.

HOW CANDIDATES ARE NOMINATED

Deborah Knox Livingston, National Director Department Christian Citizenship

It has been well said that the time for a citizen to investigate the record and character of a candidate for office is before he is nominated. The nomination of candidates for public office is one of the most serious functions of the voter. It is the privilege as well as the duty of every voter to have a voice in the selection of the candidates who are to represent him in the government.

The importance of nominating only such candidates as are held in high esteem by their fellow citizens cannot be too strongly emphasized. There has been in the past too much power given the corrupt politician in dictating the party nominations, and this in large measure has been due to the apathy and indifference shown in these matters by the average voter. Until the individual voter has been made to feel his personal responsibility in nominating the candidates of his party, there is not much hope for the establishment of Christian ideals in government, by party action.

Whenever a candidate for public office seeks the support of the voters of his district, two questions should be asked concerning such a candidate: First, is he a man of integrity and unquestioned moral character; and second, has he the ability to successfully perform the duties of the office to which he aspires. Character and ability should constitute the "acid test" for every candidate who aspires to public office.

Our present party organizations came into being largely in order that certain groups might control the selection of candidates, and the nomination and election of candidates is still the central activity of all party organizations. In many instances the groups, familiarly known as "the machine," have used their power either for personal gain or party preferment rather than for the best interests of the state. It is well for us to remember that political parties are simply large groups of citizens who agree concerning certain policies in government and who act together in the nomination and election of officials whose duty it is to carry out these policies.

There are two ways by which candidates are nominated: The first is known as the primary, sometimes called the direct method; the second way is by the action of party conventions. In the majority of states, the direct method of nominating candidates has been adopted, while a few states still cling to the convention method.

There is still a great deal of discussion as to the value of the primary method, and in some states where it has been tried out, there has been dissatisfaction and attempts have been made to repeal the law. The outstanding value of the primary method is that each voter has the opportunity to select his own party candidate, and does not leave the selection to representatives of his party, as is the case in the convention method. The supporters of the primary method argue that it is the most democratic method.

The plan most commonly used, by which the names of available candidates are placed before the people, is by what is known as the primary petition. This petition contains the names of the voters who have united on a certain candidate for a special office. In some states the naming of candidates for party nomination is by petition only. The number of signatures required upon the petition depends upon the office to which the candidate is to be elected and upon the population of the community. After the petition has been circulated and the required number of names secured, there is held a primary election at which the name is presented and the nomination confirmed. This method holds in nominating all candidates for the humblest office up to that of presidential elector.

It is at the primary that delegates are elected to the county or city conventions and at these conventions, delegates are elected to the state convention. The state convention is most important, for it is at the state convention that delegates are chosen for the national convention, where the nominations for President and Vice President are made. National conventions of the several parties are held every four years, and at the national conventions the policies of the party are defined in what is called the party platform.

We see, therefore, the great importance of the primary, and the urgent need of each voter taking an intelligent part in its proceedings.

In the past there have been, and doubtless there still are, many irregularities, if not absolute dishonesty, at the primary elections, but in most of the states now the primaries have been placed under the control of the law and it is generally conceded that the primary elections are now honestly conducted, at least as much so as any other election.

We must stress the importance of the woman voter taking an active part in the primary. If we desire to see reform accomplished and worthy candidates nominated who will insure good government, we must begin the work in the primary.

Law Should Be Obeyed

The prohibition law has been honored altogether too much in the breach rather than in the observance.

Whether one favored or opposed national prohibition, that is now the law of the land and it should be respected and obeyed. Federal officials have represented themselves as powerless to enforce it and I have recommended that the Massachusetts law be made to conform to that of the United States in this respect so that local officers might aid in the enforcement. If public sentiment tolerates to any considerable extent the open violaton of the prohibition law it will not be long before other laws which are not approved by individuals will be violated. It is not enough to believe in abstract law. We must obey, in spirit and in act, each concrete law. A good citizen will keep the prohibition law without dissimulation.

Cities Continue to Go On Record Against Modification of Volstead Act

By vote of 18 to 6 the city council of Minneapolis has gone on record as opposed to the amendment of the Volstead act to permit the sale of light wines and beer. A communication requesting that a resolution be sent to Congress asking for such modification of prohibition was considered, and one alderman moved that the request be complied with, but the motion failed to receive a second. It was then voted to file the communication without action.

By a vote of two to one the Cheyenne city commissioners protested against the repeal of the Volstead act, and in the following words expressed faith in the ultimate success of the present law, provided it is not weakened: "We believe no law has had a more beneficial effect upon the city of Cheyenne than the law prohibiting the liquor traffic." Attention was then called to the local police statistics, and the resolution stated further: "We believe the legalizing of beer and wine for beverage purposes would nullify the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment."

Springfield, Missouri, is a city of approximately 50,000 inhabitants. It stands strongly for high ideals, as was shown by its recent vote on the question of Sunday picture shows, which resulted in their being barred. The mayor, W. E. Freeman, received from the Chicago board of aldermen the resolution in regard to the modification of the Volstead Act, but, because he considered it both unconstitutional and un-American, refused to present it to the city commissioners.

Other cities to go against modification of prohibition are: Peoria, Aurora, and East St. Louis, Illinois; Detroit, Grand Rapids, Kalamazoo and Lansing, Michigan; San Diego and Long Beach, California; Everett, Washington; Portland, Oregon; New Orleans, Louisiana. In fact very few city councils seem desirous of allying themselves definitely with the wet forces by voting for the amendment of the Volstead law.

Minnesota Druggists Against Illicit Sale of Liquor

Minnesota druggists will throw their strength behind prohibition enforcement officials as a defense measure against the unscrupulous individuals who ente the profession simply for the purpose c making illegal sales of liquor. Th drug stores of the state will be license to eliminate illicit liquor sales, if th state legislature of 1923 acts favorabl upon the resolution which the sta Pharmaceutical Association has passed i its annual convention just over. Th resolution reads that the board c pharmacy will have power to grant license to open a pharmacy or drug sto where there is a reasonable public d mand and to license all pharmacies drug stores now existing.

"Action of the government, which h ruled that the druggist shall be the d penser of liquor, has placed us in undignified position as a profession wi the public only too ready to censure a condemn us," said the president of t association, Edward A. Grochau, as made the recommendation that the su ject of enforcing the law be consider "It will be only by our actions in livi up to the requirements of the Volste act that we can retain the respect the community and that of the gove ment."

THE ANTI-ALCOHOL MOVEMENT IN OTHER LANDS

Socialists Urge Germany To Become Dry

"Prohibition is being urged for Germany," cabled a special correspondent of the Chicago Daily News from Berlin, some weeks ago. "The second largest political party—that of the independent Socialists—has put before the reichstag a resolution demanding that the German parliament immediately investigate the result of prohibition in the United States, with a view to passing a law permitting the sale of alcohol for medical purposes only. The resolution reads, in part, as follows:

"'Official American statistics and reports of the boards of health in New York, Chicago, Boston and other large cities prove beyond a doubt that there has been a tremendous improvement in public health resulting directly from the ban on alcohol. Is the government willing to obtain all available official information from the United States on the prohibition question in order to limit the use of alcohol to hospitals and technical laboratories?'

"This question, asked by millions of working men who belong to the independent socialist party, which is looked upon as the coming political power in Germany, has effectually driven the smile from the faces of persons who only yesterday were sneering at Americans who declare that the United States was actually dry."

As Sister Nations See Us

The United States of America has the reputation of possessing a high degree of moral idealism. Mr. Fred Smith, representative of the Federal Council of Churches, who is making a world tour in the interests of world friendship and world evangelization, tells of a conversation with the former president of the League of Nations, who insisted that the United States was greatly needed in any association of nations. "I have been told this by many European statesmen," said Mr. Smith. "Will you please tell me why you think you need us?" "Because of the moral idealism of the United States," quickly responded the European statesman. "And what, if you please, do you mean by our moral idealism?" asked Mr. Smith. "The answer was prompt: "WELL, FOR EXAMPLE, YOU HAVE OUTLAWED THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC."

It behooves America to look well these days to her reputation as a nation of high moral idealism, and to see that the thirty societies organized for the purpose of trailing it in the mire of corrupt politics shall not control the affairs of this nation at the next election.

The Czecho-Slovakian house of deputies has voted by a great majority a law, presented by Dr. Holitscher, prohibiting the sale of all alcoholic liquors to children under sixteen years, and of distilled liquors to youths under eighteen.

Chile Industrial Towns Want No Saloons

Several mining and industrial towns of Chile have asked President Alessandri to obtain from the Chilean congress as early as possible the passage of laws making the towns dry. It is urged that this should be done as a saving measure for the future of the industries and the health of the operatives at these places. Valparaiso was not included, but the Anti-Alcoholic League of Valparaiso petitioned the president to make this proposed law apply to Valparaiso also, because of its maritime, commercial and industrial activities. Senor Alessandri, who has been a friend of the prohibition movement, replied that though it would be necessary for congress to pass such a law, he agreed with the league that the establishment of dry zones in all industrial centers and wherever there is an agglomeration of workmen is a necessity for national salvation.

Sans Alcohol Bars In Switzerland

"In its health propaganda the National League Against Alcoholism of France suggests temperance bars where soft drinks and cold meats and egg dishes may be sold at low prices to entice the working man away from the saloon," reports The Survey. "The example is cited of Switzerland where, it is claimed, people are beginning to prefer soft drinks to hard, and children are growing up without knowing alcoholic drinks."

"ARGUMENTS FOR PROHIBITION FOUND HERE"

There is no notice at the entrance of the infirmary at Oak Forest, Cook County, Illinois, proclaiming, "Arguments for Prohibition Found Here." Indeed the management of that worthy institution would undoubtedly be scandalized at the suggestion but nevertheless there they are. You don't find them in ponderous volumes or conspicuous posters. Rather are they to be discovered in the records of the lives of broken men and women residents, the flotsam and jetsam of humanity from the near-by big city of Chicago.

"Anybody who imagines that prohibition does not prohibit, that it is not wrecking drunkenness, ought to spend a little time with us and study the situation," said Pastor W. J. Maplesden, upon a recent visit of the writer to this up-to-date home for indigent and invalid men, women and children.

"So you are willing to tell the world," queried the visitor, "that this institution can furnish evidence that prohibition is really making an impression upon the drinking habits of the citizens of Chicago?"

"Certainly, I am willing to give that testimony," was the prompt response. "The individuals who make up our present population are of a radically different class from those who came to us before prohibition. The dry law has materially lessened if not eliminated the barrel-house bums. I can recall these corridors being filled with cots to accommodate the scum of Chicago's saloon districts in the ante-prohibition days."

For corroboration of his words, the chaplain placed in the hands of his visitor the latest published report of the Cook County Institutions, in which was found the following significant statement from Superintendent Bailey:

"The advent of prohibition undoubtedly has had much to do with the shrinkage of our population. A large percentage of our male inmates come from the lodging-house districts and formerly were heavy drinkers. In the days when liquor was cheap and lunches were served in saloons free of charge, these men were but little interested in caring for themselves outside of living from hand to mouth. Temporary breakdowns in their physical or mental condition were of frequent occurrence. The Infirmary's doors were open at all times for the unfortunate. However, about the time the price of illicit liquor began to soar, and as saloon free lunches no longer were spread, there was a noticeable lessening in the arrivals at the Institutions. The squandering of earnings, meager as they might be, was halted, with the result that meal tickets and other useful articles were purchased instead; physical and mental breakdowns became a thing of the past, and the habitual poor-house guest no longer sought shelter here."

"But prohibition came too late to save many of the inmates of this institution," Pastor Maplesden remarked sympathetically, as he led the way down the corridor to the ward that housed the irresponsibles and incurables—a dull-eyed, heavy-faced company of men, prematurely aged and enfeebled. "Many of these men are the victims of alcoholism and the deadly diseases that follow in its train. In the tuberculosis building you will find a large number whose loss of health is due to the alcohol habit, and others whose powers of resistance have been so weakened and broken down that T. B. claimed them."

It was the women's ward,—filled with pathetic figures of mothers and grandmothers, spending their last days as county wards, with such comforts as can be provided in the dormitories and common sitting room, but denied that privacy and cosy home corner so dear to the hearts of all women—where one saw evidences of earnings of husbands squandered over the bar to swell the fortunes of brewer or distiller rather than saved to provide a competence for the days of helplessness.

The tragedy of this, as of all similar institutions, is the company of little children, 200 out of the 3400, deficient mentally, epileptic, deprived of their birthright of health of body, mind and soul and reared in an environment that gave them no chance to develop because the money that should have given them opportunity was squandered in drink.

"Then the conclusion of the whole matter is that prohibition, even though not perfectly enforced, is a pretty good business proposition, that ought to appeal to the man who has to pay taxes for the upkeep of institutions like yours?" was the question asked of the chaplain.

"Yes, even in the least important matter of dollars and cents," said the pastor to these broken-hearted souls, "prohibition is worth while, if one is to judge by the histories of the people who come to us. And in other ways, of course, one cannot estimate its value, especially in the saving of the children and youth that are growing up in a country where the liquor evil, even though still with us, is an outlaw, and no longer receives the sanction of the government."

Letters received from our National W. C. T. U. president tell of her safe arrival in Mexico City. Several conferences have already been held with friends who are eager to see the work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union strengthened and extended. On her first Sunday in Mexico, Miss Gordon spoke at two services in the Union American and Spanish Church.

"Lest We Forget"

"It was the Constitution we amended, not human beings," says "Sid" in an introduction to an article in the March American Magazine that he describes as an old fashioned temperance discourse. It is an interview with Dr. Albert M. Barrett, head of the state Psycopathic Hospital of the University of Michigan, containing the basic truths that underlie the Eighteenth Amendment which need to be reiterated and re-emphasized. When a popular magazine gives space to such a scholarly treatment of the alcohol question it is deserving of commendation. It would be a gracious act to let the editor know our appreciation.

If People Would Only Stop Thinking

The thirty or more societies organized for the purpose of nullifying the Eighteenth Amendment possibly might succeed in their purpose if the people could be persuaded to accept at face value the statements published in the pro-liquor papers and refrain from thinking for themselves.

The Indiana W. C. T. U. has initiated a plan to stimulate independent thought as to the prohibition law by offering prizes to the undergraduate students of its colleges for the three best essays on "Why the Volstead Law Should be Upheld." We venture that not only the students but the parents and friends of the contestants will be led by this offer to study the subject and arrive at their own conclusions.

The idea is far too good to be confined to the limits of the Hoosier state and it is hoped the other forty-seven state W. C. T. U.'s will start a similar contest. Details of the plan appear on page 11.

An Indictment

The story in this issue, entitled "Blinded by Drink," which with its tragic climax will grip the hearts of our readers, is one of the strongest indictments possible of moderate drinking, because it is true. The author, in a letter accompanying the manuscript, says, "The setting and conversation are fiction, but the tragic event actually took place some years ago. A young woman took the account to a 'Liberty League' meeting and read it, and I am told that it broke up the meeting."

Could anything more clearly illustrate the evils of moderate drinking, or prove that even a comparatively small amount of alcohol will so befuddle a man's brains as to bring disaster upon himself and others? One need not drink to excess to cause lifelong sorrow to innocent victims of so-called "personal liberty". Even though the Organization Opposed to the Prohibition Amendment, and others like-minded, could do what they claim, that is, bring back moderate drinking without the dangers of excessive indulgence (an impossibility),—even in such a case they would be endangering not only their own welfare, but the welfare, and indeed the very lives, of all who are directly or indirectly associated with them.

Let us " work and pray" against an enemy which makes possible such tragedies!

Your Citizenship Pledge

Have you begun to think about the coming elections? Do you know who in your state are seeking to be candidates for Congress, or what state or local officials are to be voted for? Have you made yourself familiar with the various measures which are to be decided?

Perhaps your reply to these questions is, "Why, no," perhaps you say, "The elections are months away, and I shall have plenty of time between now and then to make decisions."

But—do you recall the last elections? How many times was it said to you, "I voted a straight ticket simply because I knew nothing of the candidates"? In many cases those who were elected to fill the minor positions in both community and state were put into office by persons who never had heard the names until they saw them on the ballot election day.

"Something is wrong with democracy. It is not functioning," said a university professor in a recent address, then he went on to say that many voters are failing to vote. Last fall in some states the deficiency was 47 per cent of the adult citizenship, and a survey by a woman's organization brought out such objections as "Don't want to bother"; "Don't care who is elected"; "What difference does one vote make?" or "Didn't know anything about the candidate."

It would be a good plan to add to your list of New-Year resolutions the pledge recently published by the Citizenship Committee of the Chicago Association of Commerce:

"With sincere belief in the noble purposes which gave birth to our nation and in the lofty principles which have been wrought into its Constitution, with ardent love for the country which has conferred upon me a priceless heritage of freedom and opportunity, I gratefully acknowledge my privilege and obligations as an American citizen and promise to vote at all primaries and elections so that I may help to give assurance that 'government of the people, by the people and for the people shall not perish from the earth.' "

To this pledge should be added the sincere purpose to see that your ballot is educated. Your union or your Y. P. B. should make a list of the candidates for various positions as soon as they are known. Watch the present incumbent and be ready to cast your vote to keep him in office if he is satisfactory. Gather information about all those in the various parties, remembering that a good way to "clean politics" is to start with the smaller offices. If the minor places are filled with good men, the other officials will not be able to do as much harm and as these good officials become better known they will be put into the higher places. "He that is faithful in that which is least is faithful also in much," said One long ago Who was Himself a private citizen, but upon Whose doctrines the democracies of the world have been, and are being, established.

The Influence of the Press

If there is a "power behind the throne in these days, that power is the press. More and more is its influence extending. "The court of public opinion is a stolid jury sitting in the tribunal of life," says someone. This jury listens to the evidence submitted, weighs it, and then gives the irrevocable verdict. But the evidence concerning prohibition, as given publicity through the press, is often that of biased witnesses.

As the South Bend (Indiana) Tribune puts it: "Some newspapers have evidently become convinced that prohibition is bound to fail. Favoring the liquor traffic they are publishing matter designed to spread distrust of the present situation." That the Tribune itself does not belong to this class is seen by the publication of a series of articles under the general heading of "How Goes Prohibition," presented, as it admits, with a purpose. "The people need to know as much about the constructive and successful side of prohibition" as about the violations, in order that they may be impervious to the propaganda of the political organizations that are striving night and day to delude the people into the belief that prohibition is a failure, that it is unpopular, that it cannot be enforced, and that it should be overthrown."

A Michigan paper, the Fremont Times Independent, makes the forcible statement that were it not for a few of the large cities the prohibition question would be considered settled and little agitation for the resumption of the liquor traffic would be accorded more than a passing notice. "But cities like New York, Chicago, Boston and San Francisco are as wet as they dare be and the great daily papers of these metropolitan centers are read in all the cities, villages and rural districts of the country. These journals, naturally wet, carry propaganda of the wet element to every nook and corner of the United States, and many mistake this provincial agitation for a general sentiment believed to be pervading the country."

Of course, this sweeping statement will not apply to all the metropolitan press, for some of the journals, such as the Los Angeles Times, though not at first favorable, are nevertheless coming out strongly on the subject of law enforcement. To quote the last-named paper: "We feel that it is no longer a question of prohibition. It is now a question of defiance to the Constitution, unquestionably fostered by the tolerant humorous attitude adopted toward it by many newspapers and other publications." The New York Evening Post admits that "the great stretches of the country in which the mass of the people live know of the spectacular battle between officer and bootlegger only as they know of any other distant event. Over most of the country prohibition is a commonplace fact. The spirit of violation which is so conspicuous in centers like New York is absent from the rest of the country." In commenting on the general situation the Walla Walla (Washington) Bulletin says that "People are beginning to realize that if public sentiment takes a tolerant attitude toward the violation of liquor laws, or is jocular about their violation, violation of other laws will increase. We cannot wink at one kind of crime without encouraging other kinds."

To the "explanation" of the Milwaukee Sentinel that the "basic dishonesty" of the Volstead law "is one of the reasons for the general lack of respect in which it is held, and that a reasonable and honest enforcement statute would be the greatest help toward establishing and confirming the principle enunciated in the Eighteenth Amendment," the Beloit (Wisconsin) News makes the pertinent reply that "The Sentinel might lend its good offices to elucidating the paradox of how great dryness is to come out of greater dampness."

From the Bonham Favorite, Texas, comes the reminder that "those New York and Chicago newspaper correspondents who have an idea that reports of the number of deaths from drinking poison whisky will cause a revolution in the sentiment for prohibition, mistake the temper of the American people." From another southern paper comes the challenge: "Those who aspire to see the prohibition laws enforced will hold the daily newspapers, and especially the makers of comic strips, responsible for a great deal of the trouble that exists at present," and the Grantsburg (Wisconsin) Journal in reminding its readers that many of the powerful dailies are still owned or controlled by stockholders of breweries or distilleries, speaks also of the country press which almost universally takes the commendable stand of strongly supporting rigid enforcement, not only of the prohibition law, but of all laws.

Says the Warren (Ohio) Tribune: "As in all matters of the sort, enforcement of prohibition depends to a large extent on newspapers. They reach the public every day, their preachments carry weight, they have a certain power to influence and mold public opinion..... It is the duty of the newspaper to uphold the prohibition law..... If newspapers function properly, the public will be taught to avoid the bootlegger's wares, law officers will be compelled to enforce the law, and the way of the illicit liquor dealer will become too rocky and thorny for travel."

It would be well to re-read the statement made by James Bryce, in his "Modern Democracies": "It (the press) can incessantly repeat the same argument or accusation; and can do this incidentally as well as in a set way so as to influence the host of readers who are too listless to inquire into the truth of assertions sandwiched in between the news..... Iteration is like the ceaseless stream of bullets from a machine gun. It is the deadliest engine of war in the press armory."

And the moral is not hard to find: What is the sentiment of your papers? What are you doing to increase their power for good?

A Prayer League For a Dry Nation

"A saloonless nation in 1920," was the product of prayer. In response to an appeal sent out by a Presbyterian minister, thousands of ministers covenanted to petition God, in at least one pulpit prayer each Sunday, that America should become a saloonless nation in 1920.

God heard and answered the prayers of his servants. Can we now afford to forget God? Dare we assume ourselves capable of putting through a campaign, the object of which is a dry nation, without concertedly petitioning the God of Nations to aid us and give us moral courage and strength to combat our enemies? Let us remember that the God who helped us through many years of struggle to achieve our goal, "A saloonless nation in 1920," is also willing to aid us to reach another goal, "A Dry Nation in 1928," but we must not forget to give Him credit for what He has done, neither must we forget to implore His aid in the great struggle now ahead of us.

This year we elect congressmen; the battle of the years before 1920 is to be refought. We will elect congressmen in 1922-1924-1926-1928; and if we defeat the wet forces in these four congressional elections, the victory is ours for sobriety, righteousness, a dry nation, and for God.

In behalf of wives who have drunken husbands, and mothers who have drunken sons and ruined daughters; in behalf of thousands of ruined homes and millions of debauched lives, and for the honor and glory of God, I ask my brethren, the ministers of all denominations, to covenant with me to pray, in at least one pulpit prayer, each Sunday that God will give us a bone dry nation by 1928.

Ministers of all denominations, who will covenant thus with me, please send me a post card to that effect. Your card will be put on file, and as the league grows announcement will be made in THE UNION SIGNAL and other papers.

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awakening continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

Trust

Julia H. Thayer

To walk by the side of the Master
Through days that are peaceful and bright;
To look in His face with fond yearning
And talk of the City of Light;
To thrill at the sound of His accents;
To lavish a rapture that must
Overflow in warm acts of devotion;
That is not, no, that is not trust.

But to fare forth alone in the darkness,
Tear-blinded, soul-wounded, heart-sore;
To grope your strange way only knowing
That somewhere "He goeth before";
To cry in your anguish of spirit,
As prostrate you fall in the dust;
"Though He slay me I still, still will love Him!"—
Oh, that is the heart, soul of trust.

Light of the World, whose glory shines in the face of Jesus Christ, shine in our darkness to the splendor of thy perfect day. Thou dwellest in mystery of light, and we reach up toward thee in full assurance of thy presence and thy will to make us pure. Disperse our fears. Transform our ambitions. Teach us to leave the paths of shadow for the way of truth. Help us to trust thee wholly and to take each step thy wisdom shows in quiet confidence and joyful hope, assured of thee whatever else may fail. May the revelation of thyself through us grow ever clearer as we walk with thee. Let it shine in common things and quiet hours, from thee to us; from us, by thee, to those who need and know thee not, that we may show forth thy glory and be made partakers of the joy of Christ. Amen.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

As a Young Man Sees It

In the $100 prize article in McCall's Magazine, written in answer to the question, "Are We Right About Prohibition?" Wesley Taylor of Lenoir, North Carolina, says:

"I am a young man in my twenties. I can buy liquor now if I want it, but I cannot walk into a store and get it across the counter as I can get a toothbrush. And when I have surreptitiously got my drink, if I get it, I must pay for it at an outrageous figure. The man must have a good profit for the risk he takes. I think the price generally ranges from five to twenty dollars a quart for whisky—say an average of twelve dollars a quart. There is not twelve dollars' worth of fun in a quart of whisky.

* * * *

"I think I am perhaps not altogether a stranger in the Brotherhood of Joy Lovers, and I know somewhat the difference between the influence of a wet and a dry town during one's habit-forming years—and I wonder if those are not the years that really count in the long run. And I thoroughly believe that prohibition, poorly enforced though it is now, is a good law. I know I am naturally of the eat, drink and be merry disposition, and I wonder if I would show even a respectable resistance if I had put squarely before me the choice to take or to let alone. But the choice to decide for myself is now superseded by a law of the land which sternly tells me that I must behave myself or pay a heavy price for my forbidden indulgence. I am glad of it.

* * * *

"And there are millions like me. The American homes of the future will be fathered by these millions; for the sake of the American homes—which means the American nation itself—let us keep the Eighteenth Amendment."

"I Like Beer But I Don't Like to Break the Law"

John MacFarlane Howe of Grand Rapids is a humorist and was so introduced at the annual Schubert club banquet held recently in that city. He lived up to his reputation on the occasion but also showed that he could not get a laugh out of what too many people seem to think today is the biggest joke in the world, the Eighteenth Amendment. Mr. Howe elicited applause when he remarked that he liked a beer garden but added quickly without the trace of a twinkle in his eyes, "I do not like to break laws. And when the United States government says I am breaking the law when I drink the stuff they sell in a beer garden I quit drinking it. Frankly, no man enjoys good liquor as I do and it is not for me to say whether the Eighteenth Amendment is wise or unwise. But law is law and no man has a right to break it."

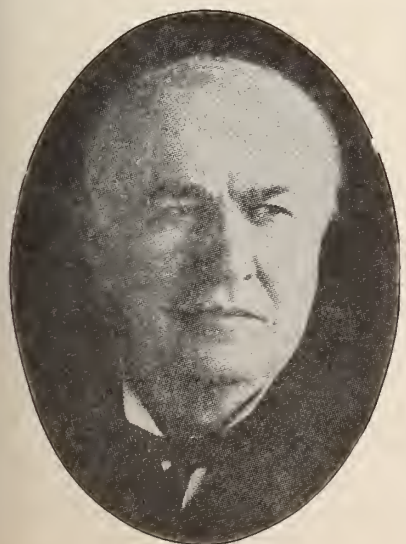
Chicago's Superintendent of Schools Urges Students To Make "Mental Budgets"

A "Mental Budget" for students was urged by Superintendent of Schools Peter A. Mortenson.

"The budget should consist of the things the student wishes to accomplish, and should be made up in order that he or she may have always a definite program in mind," he said. "Scattered efforts do not bring rewards, and the drifter, the student without ultimate objects, will never accomplish much."



Thomas Edison on Law Enforcement and Prohibition

"I have never had time, not even five minutes, to be tempted to do anything against the moral law, the civil law, or any law whatever. If I were to hazard a guess as to what young people should do to avoid temptation, it would be to get a job and work at it so hard that temptation would not exist for them." These are the words of Thomas A. Edison, who last month celebrated his seventy-fifth birthday.

Of prohibition he said at a meeting of his Ediphone distributors, at the West Orange, N. J., laboratories, August 12, 1921: "It is the greatest thing in America today. Drinking whisky is a rotten habit. Everybody ought to help to protect himself from it. Even the drunkards should help, and they would if they had plain common sense."

Florida W. C. T. U. Conference Voices Slogan, "Law Enforcement Is Our Job and We Must Help"

Irene G. Adams, Press Superintendent Florida W. C. T. U.

A combination of conditions in a few cities of Florida, because of the tourist season then on, necessitated the substitution of a conference of the state W. C. T. U. officers for the regular thirty-eighth annual convention. It is the second time only that a conference has been necessary. This one took place at New Smyrna and a gratifying heart to heart intimacy prevailed.

At two public evening meetings held in churches, addresses were made by the state evangelist, Rev. Mable Q. Stevens, and the national organizer and lecturer, Mrs. Lora S. La Mance, one of the very welcome new residents of Florida. The superintendent of schools invited these women to speak to the pupils. Mrs. Stevens gave a talk to the girls and Mrs. La Mance to the boys.

The president closed her brief address with these suggestions for every union to follow, emphasizing the necessity for Christian women to hold a vision of active participation in civic affairs:

Appoint an agent for our publications and if necessary appropriate money to supply THE UNION SIGNAL to the four general officers.

Educate members to believe that a careful exercise of their right to vote is a Christian duty, and that they are responsible for the election of good officials.

Teach constantly that every woman can and should aid in law enforcement, and that to teach and practice reverence for all laws is the first article of the citizen's creed.

Arrange for study courses in citizenship and make earnest efforts to enroll women not especially interested in politics, and others outside our organization.

A letter was sent by the conference to the local school board commending its ruling that pupils using liquor shall be barred from attending any school in the county. The Florida delegate to the national convention at San Francisco reported it as a meeting "of thrills from beginning to end, and with law enforcement as its keynote."

The gain of members over last year in Florida was 538. The largest membership of any union, and that not in a large town, was 185. Frequently a half-dozen members have performed more real initiative work for reform than the entire membership of larger unions.

UNION SIGNAL subscriptions reported, 204; scientific temperance essays written, 247. The superintendent of this department received the banner for the greatest amount of work done. She reported that a Florida girl won the national S. T. I. prize.

The announcement that at the last session of the legislature a law was passed making the mother an equal partner with the father in the ownership and the guardianship of the child was enthusiastically applauded. For fourteen years the W. C. T. U. has been trying to secure this law.

The subject of law enforcement was discussed frequently. It was said, "IT IS OUR JOB AND WE MUST HELP."

It is a humiliating fact that Florida is very wet despite the law, for the Bahama Islands are only thirty miles distant from the east coast and liquors are being smuggled into the state brought to the islands from Cuba. It is carried to our shores by ships, aeroplanes, and small boats. Over the waterways of the state, and the railways hidden in carloads of fruits or vegetables or by autos over the fine roadways that have really become booze arteries, it finds its way, doubtless, to every state in the Union.

Enforcement officers? Yes! But with two-hundred miles of water and shore teeming with whiskyteers, an army of officers are required. Sessions of Federal Courts are so few and far between that men under arrest and under bonds for appearance at court, almost forget that they are criminals. A large majority of the daily papers are like oysters; they have nothing to say when the tide comes in or when it goes out, but the weekly papers deplore, in strong language, the fact that Florida is the dumping place of Cuban-stored liquor.

Our state president, Miss Minnie J. Neal, endeavors to attend the district conventions and is a welcome and helpful member of each. She is a strict parliamentarian and sees that the presiding district officers are guided by the rules and regulations. She is also prolific in wise suggestions for every locality. Her popularity is evidenced by the fact that fifteen years of service as state president have brought her devotion from the white ribboners of the state, and only one black lot is cast against her each year a lot that undoubtedly is her own.

BLINDED BY DRINK

Fred Marlette

It was the ordinary boarding house group who were gathered around the table that evening, and the conversation was of the usual boarding house character, lively and varied. The war and who had won it had been discussed to our satisfaction; the high cost of living, the prevailing disordered condition of affairs, and many other subjects had furnished matter for crisp debates. On this particular evening some one, I forget who, had set us going on prohibition.

"For my part", said a young man, a printer by trade, "I think the Government is going too far. We can dispense with whisky, but if beer is denied the workingmen it will greatly increase unrest."

"On the contrary," put in the bank clerk, "drink, in the past, has been the greatest of all causes of unrest and the best way to prevent disturbances is to take away all causes of strife."

"I don't agree with you," exclaimed a university student, who boasted of being a specialist in economics. "The great cause of unrest is not beer, but capitalism. Now—"

"Give us a rest on that, Ned," interrupted another student, "we had your complete lecture on that subject last Thursday. I am for prohibition. It's the only way to deal with the curse of alcohol."

"Yes," said the printer, "that's all right as regards spirits, but why not let the workingmen have light wine and beer?"

"Because," said the medical student, "to drink beer is the most harmful way of taking alcohol. If we are to have liquor at all let us have pure spirits. In beer you get the spirits diluted with a lot of slops. The worst drunkards are the beer drunkards, as witness the bums who used to frequent the barrel houses."

"What's the use of all this talk, anyway?" broke in another of the boys. "The whole thing is wrong for it interferes with personal liberty. I am not a drunkard, and I claim the privilege of taking liquor if I want it, and I am willing to concede this right to others. Alcohol in itself is not bad. It's the abuse, not the use of it, that does harm. There are a hundred moderate drinkers to every drunkard. Why should all the moderate drinkers be deprived of their rights because a few men will persist in making beasts of themselves?"

"I'll answer your question," said a quiet young girl who seldom took part in the discussion. She was a fair-haired, blue-eyed miss of seventeen, or so, with a sweet, sensitive mouth. She spoke in a soft, low voice, yet there was a quality in it that compelled attention.

"My father's farm," she said, "is about six miles from the valley of Nettleton. Six years ago last fall my brother got something in his eye at threshing time. It bothered him for several days and the inflammation became noticeable. At last father called in Doctor Thorpe who lived in Nettleton. He treated the eye for some time but without success. At last he advised an operation. Of course my brother and father and mother hesitated, but brother kept getting worse and worse and the inflammation threatened to spread to his other eye. The doctor insisted that the affected eye must be taken out. At last consent was given. It was arranged to bring a nurse from the city and have the work done in our own home. A date was fixed and the nurse and doctor arrived together, bringing with them an operating table. Mother said afterwards that she detected liquor on Doctor Thorpe's breath the moment he entered the house, but otherwise he seemed to be in his usual normal condition. People said he could carry a lot of liquor without showing it. He was not a drunkard. I do not think he was ever what you would call intoxicated; but it was well known that he had ale, stout and such liquors on his table, and took them habitually. He was a typical moderate drinker.

"Well, the family was excluded from the room until the operation was over. The nurse had never seen my brother before; had she been familiar with the case she would doubtless have prevented what happened.

"When it was over, my father lifted my brother from the operating table to the bed, and we were all admitted to the room. I was only a small girl but I remember everything distinctly, it was all so strange and wonderful to me.

"The doctor was washing and packing his instruments when my brother began to come out from under the anesthetic. He rolled and tossed about and muttered something in a thick voice. After a time he gave a sharp cry and sat up in bed and in spite of his nurse tore off the bandages."

The little country girl paused and her sensitive lips twitched as if she were going to cry. With an effort she controlled herself.

"The doctor—had taken out—the wrong eye."

A horrified shudder went through her listeners. Some of the women began to cry. The medical student blurted out:

"The blamed fool of an idiot!"

"Of course nothing could be done," said someone.

"Oh, no. My brother is stone blind. An eye specialist told us afterwards that the first eye could have been saved if in the beginning it had received proper treatment. My father entered suit for damages, but Doctor Thorpe fled to Mexico, or somewhere. He had no funds, to speak of, anyway; no amount of money could, of course, compensate my brother for the loss of his sight."

She turned to the liquor advocate in answer to whose assertions she had told the story.

"That is why I am opposed to so-called moderate drinking of beer or any other liquor."

"Hear! Hear!" came from several voices.

The printer ended the discussion:

"After what we have heard, I guess there's nothing more to be said."

The Enemy

Frances S. Hallowes

(The S. S. "Persia" is bound for India, having among its passengers Major Orde and Bertram Harford, who have become acquainted with a Mrs. Carlyle, her small son, Eric, and Angela O'Connor, who, in the charge of Mrs. Carlyle, is on her way to marry a Deputy Commissioner at Seraneb. Harford, who is a total abstainer, is glad to note that Angela refuses to drink, and the two become good friends. Consequently, Harford is much shocked to learn that Angela has been induced by Mrs. Carlyle to take some whisky for seasickness and has been overcome by the liquor. Through pity for her he breaks his reticence on the subject, and tells her that both his parents were victims of drink, and that he had promised his mother on her deathbed never to touch alcohol in any form. Angela admits that she has made her mother a similar promise, but does not mention any particular reason therefor. One night, while his mother is at a bridge party, tiny Eric helps himself to her whisky, left out on the table in their cabin, and quickly becomes unconscious.)

CHAPTER IV.

"Mr. Harford, Mr. Harford, come at once," an agonized voice cried outside his cabin door, just as he had closed it for the night.

He opened it. There stood Angela O'Connor, pale, distraught and trembling.

"What is it, Miss O'Connor?"

"Eric, Eric," she faltered; "he is dying, I think; please fetch the doctor."

Harford lost no time and was soon at the door of No. 79 with the doctor.

Moans issued from inside. The two men were admitted by Angela. Mrs. Carlyle was on her knees with her arms round the child, calling to him to awaken.

The little face was red and swollen: he breathed with deep, snoring respirations and convulsive movements of the tiny body, which grew stronger each moment.

The doctor took the child from his mother, laid him down on the berth, looked at his eyes, smelt his breath.

"Alcoholic poisoning," he muttered; then "I will fetch a stomach-pump—the only chance," and was gone.

Harford heard the low exclamation, and turning to Mrs. Carlyle, said, "He is poisoned!"

"Poisoned!" she shrieked. "By whom?"

"By whisky!" He turned and held up the bottle which lay on its side empty.

She gasped, "The whisky bottle! I forgot and left it out when I went up to dinner. Oh, God, forgive me! He won't die! he shall not die!"

The doctor returned.

"Oh, doctor!" she shrieked, catching hold of his arm; "save his life for a thousand pounds."

"Madam, I will save his life for nothing, if possible," replied the man, gravely.

He endeavored to get swallowed the liquid he had brought, but with no avail. Other means were tried, but it was a hopeless case.

The distressed breathing grew fainter and fainter, then with a strong convulsive movement, the little life expired.

"He is gone," the doctor said, laying the little lifeless body down reverently. With a shriek Mrs. Carlyle pushed him aside.

"Don't touch him! he is not dead—he is asleep!" She caught the little corpse up in her arms, and looked into the sweet face and saw it stiffen and grow white and cold. Then with a groan, she sank down unconscious.

"Better so," said the doctor. Again he took the little body and laid it down, straightened the limbs and pulled a sheet over it; then, turning to Angela, who knelt with blanched and horrified face by her friend's insensible form, he said, "Miss O'Connor, let me advise you to go into the dining-saloon and lie down—you can do no good here. I will send the stewardess to Mrs. Carlyle. She shall have a sleeping draught which will keep her quiet, while all that is necessary is done."

Harford, who was waiting outside, helped Angela upstairs into the dining-saloon, fetched a pillow and rug, and tried to make her comfortable. Weeping and trembling she begged him not to leave her.

"Oh, horrible! horrible! I shall never get over this," she cried.

The doctor came in at this moment.

"Mr. Harford and Miss O'Connor, you are the only two who know of the cause of death. We must keep it quiet: we cannot allow a scandal of this kind to get abroad amongst the passengers. 'Death by misadventure,' remember. The child drank an overdose of his mother's medicine."

"Medicine," cried Harford, scornfully; "and will you, sir, lend yourself to this lie?"

"It is no lie; whisky is used as medicine, alcohol is an accepted drug, but it must not be known that whisky was the cause. I am now going to report it to the Captain, then I shall have the little fellow's body removed, and it will be buried at dawn."

"At dawn! So soon!" cried Angela, shuddering, and Harford, horrified, said,

"Oh, no, it can't be in the sea, you mean?"

"You seem dazed, my dear fellow. Where else can it be buried?"

He was gone, and Harford turned to Angela.

"Try to sleep now."

"I feel as if I should never sleep again." Then with a sob she caught his arm. "Mr. Harford, when will Eric be buried?"

"At dawn."

"Let me come and say a prayer for his poor mother."

"It will be too much for your strength."

"No, no! please come for me. I shall be watching; please promise me."

He promised reluctantly, and then left her, to spend his night in vigil, too overcome by this latest tragedy of alcohol to sleep.

The Narcotic Drug Control League

Martha M. Allen, Superintendent of Medical Temperance for the World's and National W. C. T. U.

A new national society has been organized to fight the habit forming drug evil. Headquarters are to be at 120 Broadway, New York City. The organization had its beginning among the elite, and counts among its patrons and patronesses some of the leading society people.

The first conference of this league was held in the fashionable Colony Club's assembly room on the evening of January the twentieth. The attendance was by invitation, the cards being sent out by Miss Sara Graham Mulhall, who was deputy commissioner of narcotic drug control under Governor Smith.

There was a great array of speakers on the platform, but only Miss Mulhall and Bishop Brent of the Philippine Islands were allowed over five minutes' time to present their views. Bishop Manning, Episcopal bishop of New York, presided. Colonel Griswold, in introducing the presiding officer, told of the terrible scenes he had witnessed at Camp Upton when drafted men from New York's east side were deprived of the narcotic drugs to which they had become addicted. A considerable number suffered such torture by being deprived of drugs that they had to be rejected from the army.

Bishop Brent was a member of the International Commission on Narcotics, which met at the Hague before the war. He said the German delegates to that convention were responsible for there being so little accomplished in the way of curtailment of the drug evil. He declared that there was little hope of overcoming present conditions unless we could get other nations to fall into line with us as this is a world problem. He said more must be done to develop self control among our young people. Character and self-respect are needed, as well as legislation. The main thing is to strive to control the output of narcotic drugs, and to permit no more opium or cocaine to be brought into the country than is needed for medical use.

He told of a deliberate effort to debauch school children and asserted that heroin is given them to create an appetite for the drug and thus make customers for the trade. He praised China for its effort to control the opium traffic and said that young Chinamen are greatly opposed to the use of opium; that is the popular thing there to fight the traffic. (Would that young America were as wise about the liquor traffic, was the thought of the writer!)

Miss Mulhall said that the United States is manufacturing more morphine than any other country, and its export are responsible for much of the trouble with drugs that China is having today. In 1919, Seattle alone shipped out enough morphine to make 600,000,000 doses. In this country we have a condition one-third as bad as China as regards the number of drug addicts. There are over a million and a half here. "These," she said, "are found not only in the underworld, but among people in high governmental and judicial positions. We found addiction in our most distinguished homes, and among judges, lawyers, physicians and nurses. Hundreds in our city clinic told me they began the habit by having to give the drug to sick persons in their care. One dose, two, three, and the person may be enslaved. It is not the underworld addict who is keeping the traffic alive. It is the well-to-do people who are spending millions for narcotic drugs. We cared for 10,000 addicts daily while we had the city clinic. Ninety per cent of these took heroin, the most baleful of all drugs. Why does this traffic go on? Because of the high profit in it. * * * It is easy for boys and girls to get all the heroin they want in New York. One day four school children were arrested on the street for selling heroin. Doctors are not now prescribing this drug. The U. S. Public Health Service will not permit the use of heroin where they have control. * * * Boys and girls of eleven and twelve visited our clinic for cure. Fathers and mothers came looking for lost children. If a moving picture of what we saw in that clinic could be put before the public of this country the people would arise and demand that an end be put to the possibility of such conditions."

Dr. Alexander Lambert said that heroin addicts will murder, steal, or sell themselves into prostitution to get the drug if otherwise deprived of it. He spoke strongly against alcohol, but said that the alcohol addict can do without liquor if it is taken from him, but the drug addict suffers horrible torture when he is without his drug. He expressed the view that international work must be done if success is to crown efforts in curbing this evil. They must strike at the root, the production of these harmful drugs.

Dr. Copeland, the city health commissioner, said they cured about 3,000 addicts in the city while the clinic was open, but it was so easy for these people to get the drugs again that they lapsed discouragingly.

There were several other speakers, all of whom emphasized the need of educating the public to understand the terrible condition of affairs as regards drug habits in the United States, and the need of education as to the danger in meddling with these things which make such pitiable slaves of those who learn to crave them.

As this new league is sponsored by people of wealth and high social position it is to be hoped that it may have a large influence in doing the much needed work of curbing the production of these evil drugs and so getting at the root of the trouble.

A CHALLENGE TO FINISH THE TASK

is what the Eighteenth Amendment suggests to one person. What does it suggest to you?

If you thought the motion picture SAFEGUARDING THE NATION had a message that could help meet this challenge wouldn't you do everything in your power to get this picture before school children and adults wherever possible?

SAFEGUARDING THE NATION puts forth logically and very scientifically the effects of alcohol upon the human body and the loss of mental power and efficiency due to its use. The photography is good and the purpose well-timed.

Every teacher of physiology recognizes its value. High school students call it an interesting educational film. The illustrations are practical in application, and the details carefully worked out.

A Good Citizen's Duty

The principle of prohibition is firmly established in this country. Its beneficent effects are apparent everywhere except in the anarchistic sections of the large cities. There is naught for every good citizen to do but to assist in the enforcement of the prohibition laws of the land. Fill the jails with moonshiners and bootleggers, and if the jails are not large enough to hold them, build larger jails. Those who do not believe in the enforcement of law should go to Russia and enjoy the blessings of a country where there is no respect for law.—Sparta News.

Retrospection

'Twas an old empty bottle in dire disregard,
That lay on a heap in a junk dealer's yard.
And it said to itself as it looked all around,
At rags and rubbish that littered the ground,
And the shoes and the paper and old rusty wire
That all the successful junk dealers acquire:

"Alas! Am I really descended to this,
Who once was a solace and bringer of bliss,
Cast here in the shambles all empty and dry?
Not so in the days when I sparkled with rye.
Oh! well I remember the days that are dead,
When I boasted a label of yellow and red,
And had a new cork and a place to myself
On a prominent part of the top pantry shelf.
And when I appeared every once in a while,
They greeted me then with a welcoming smile,
And patted me, praised me, and flattered me so!
Oh! well I remember the sweet long ago.
'Tis so in the world with its splendor and shine,
Its fancies and fortunes and fashion decline.
'Tis so with the glare and the glamour at last,
So swiftly the present slips into the past.
And Old Father Time, standing grim on guard,
Deposits it all in the junk dealer's yard."

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

CONGRESSMAN COOPER MAKES REPLY TO FEDERATION OF LABOR COUNCIL—THE YAP TREATY—ALL TREATIES MADE AT WASHINGTON CONFERENCE BEFORE SENATE —PROGRESS IN PLAN FOR SOLDIER BONUS—PRESIDENT RECOMMENDS SHIP SUBSIDY—NEW SENATOR FROM IOWA TAKES SEAT.

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

Congressman Cooper Makes Reply to Federation of Labor Council

Congressman John G. Cooper of Ohio, who for many years has taken a great interest in the activities of the American Federation of Labor, declares that the action of the American Federation of Labor, at a meeting held in Washington last Sunday, does not represent the rank and file of the men and women who toil.

The council went on record for a modification of the Prohibition Act to permit the manufacture and sale of wine and beer.

Mr. Cooper says:

"I cannot subscribe to the action of the American Federation of Labor in asking for wine and beer. It is not the working class which is clamoring for the return of the liquor traffic. It is a known fact that during the last six years, when the question of wine and beer has been voted upon in the industrial states and manufacturing centers, prohibition of the liquor traffic has been sustained by increasing majorities. I believe the working men and women of our country will resent this effort on the part of the brewery and liquor interests to use them as a means of bringing back to this country the degrading liquor traffic which has always been the arch-enemy of the working class, the American home and a Christian citizenship."

No one has benefited more by prohibition than the laboring man and his family.

Divorcing liquor interests from labor headquarters has made it possible for labor to fight for its rights as never before. These labor leaders prominent in this action taken recently by the council have fought prohibition from the beginning.

The Yap Treaty

By a vote of 67 to 22, the Senate ratified without reservations the treaty between the United States and Japan, confirming American cable and radio rights on the island of Yap.

The ratification followed an all-day battle during which half a dozen amendments or reservations were proposed and rejected by decisive votes.

Senator Underwood, in his support of this so-called Yap Treaty, gave his interpretation of it as follows:

"So far as I am concerned, all I see in the treaty is that Japan yields to this government the right to establish a cable station on the island of Yap, and to establish radio stations in the future if it shall desire to do so. I know there is somewhat more language than that in the treaty, but I think the language is supplemental to what has already been done."

Debate at one time on the treaty assumed an aspect of a farce comedy when Senator France offered an amendment to provide prohibition in this island, belonging to Japan. Senator Reed of Missouri, strange to say, championed this proposal.

All Treaties Made at Washington Conference Before Senate

The treaties negotiated by the Conference for Limitation of Armament were reported out of Committee this week and are now before the Senate.

The treaties won the endorsement of the Committee as they came from the Conference except the following reservation of the Four-Power Pact:

"The United States understands that under the statement in the preamble, or under the terms of this treaty, there is no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no obligation to join in any defense."

This was adopted by a vote of 10 to 3 in Committee. The vote in Committee on reporting the supplemental treaty to the Four-Power Pact was 12 to 1, with Senator Borah casting the only negative vote. There was a unanimous Committee vote on the Naval Treaty and on the Submarine and Poison Gas Treaties.

The battle for ratification has begun in the Senate.

Progress in Plan for Soldier Bonus

A compromise has been reached by members of the House Ways and Means Committee on the proposed legislation on the soldier bonus. It is understood from the committee assigned to work out the details that the cash feature has been largely eliminated. The plan under consideration is one which would enable service men to obtain funds from banks on adjusted service certificates immediately after they are issued. This it is contended would make unnecessary any heavy draft on the Federal treasury during the next two years, while the refunding of $6,500,000,000 short-dated debt is in progress.

The woman member of Congress, Miss Robertson, has boldly fought a cash bonus.

President Recommends Ship Subsidy

President Harding this week went before a joint session of Congress to urge the enactment of a law to encourage the upbuilding of a merchant marine.

The method proposed by the President and provided for in bills which have been introduced contemplates the admission of imports under a uniform rate, without regard to the flag of the ship which brings them; then the creation of a merchant marine fund by taking 10 per cent of all custom receipts. This fund will be augmented by other revenues—from tonnage, charges, sundry taxes, fees, etc. From the fund would be paid the direct aid to American ships, based on one-half of one cent for each gross ton for any vessel, regardless of speed, for each 100 miles traversed. The compensation would increase according to speed, with a maximum of 2.6 cents per gross ton per 100 miles at the rate of 23 knots.

Arguments made by some that vessels carrying the American flag throughout the world cannot be properly subsidized, on the ground that it would be favoring one interest at the expense of others, is met by the contention that the merchant marine is like the railroads—an entity serving as a national utility and national defense; that the railroads were subsidized in many ways by the government and are now, in fact, enjoying government aid that is equivalent to a subsidy. Is transportation, regardless of its character, deserving of government encouragement, and, if necessary, financial assistance, if it constitutes a national utility and an agency of defense?

New Senator from Iowa Takes Seat

Charles A. Rawson, appointed by the governor of Iowa to fill the vacancy made by the resignation of Senator Kenyon, following the latter's acceptance of an appointment as judge of the Eighth Federal Circuit Court of Appeals, has been sworn in.

The vacancy made in the chairmanship of the Committee on Education and Labor by Senator Kenyon's retirement will probably be filled by Senator Sterling of South Dakota. Senator Borah of Idaho by seniority rule would come to this place, but it is understood that he prefers to give his attention to the work on other committees.

Senator Capper of Kansas is the new chairman of the unofficial, bi-partisan agricultural bloc.

Hays Has Demonstration of His Popularity With Employes

Postmaster General Hays attended his last Cabinet meeting this week, as he retires from public office today.

Mr. Hays received an idea of his popularity among his co-workers in the Post Office department when his associates, representatives of the 326,000 postal employes, tendered him a farewell luncheon. This was arranged by the National Welfare Council, representing the various Post Office department organizations.

Dr. Hubert Work, who has been First Assistant Postmaster General and is president of the American Medical Association, has been appointed by the President to succeed Mr. Hays.

Reduction in Army and Navy Appropriations the Slogan

A cut of 50 per cent—from $790,000,000 to $400,000,000—in the army and navy appropriations, is urged by Frederick J. Libby, executive secretary of the National Council for Reduction of Armaments in this week's issue of the Council's bulletin.

In support of this position, Mr. Libby stated: "The common sense of the nation is urging the policy of drastic economy upon Congress. The army and navy appropriations constitute the only field where further economy is practicable We maintain that a 50 per cent reduction is not excessive at this time for the following reasons:

"When the treaties have been ratified universal testimony affirms that war between America and Japan will have been made, humanly speaking, impossible during the life of the naval holiday. Our relation with all other nations make war between us unthinkable.

"The 5-5-3 ratio is a maximum and not a minimum. No nation is under obligation to spend on armaments the entire sum permitted by the treaties. Peace having been assured by the success of the Conference, the race in economy is, as General Smuts says, the next race for which every nation must prepare. It is going to be a neck-breaking race and the sooner we strip for it, the better!

"Every civilized country will immediately be compelled by the burden of taxation to follow our example in economy on armaments. Japan wavers between the 50 per cent reduction of her Army advocated by her Liberals and the inconsiderable reduction recommended by her military party. Reports from London indicate that England is reluctant to build the two battleships permitted her by the treaty.

"The 50 per cent saved is needed for other things. Business men want taxes reduced and the money liberated for business use, and farmers, labor, educators, the organized women seek money for constructive uses.

Legislative Headquarters, Bliss Building, Washington, D. C., March 4, 1922.

Decrease in Alcoholic Insanity

In the annual report of the Overbrook Hospital, the hospital for Essex County, New Jersey, for 1921, the superintendent, Dr. Guy Payne, gives statistics that show the effect of national prohibition upon the percentage of alcoholic patients. During the years from 1916 they had decreased as follows: In 1916, 46; in 1917, 48; in 1918, 20; in 1919, 11; in 1920, 9; and in 1921, 4 such cases.

Philadelphia Dry Findings

In connection with statements made by the wets to the effect that prohibition showed fewer benefits in 1921 than in 1920 it is interesting to note that the statistics do not seem to bear them out. In six banks in the labor center of Philadelphia, deposits jumped from $8,965,000 in 1917 to $19,494,000 the first of the present year.

In 1918 there were 2,326 cases of alcoholism admitted to the Philadelphia General Hospital, and in 1921 only 702 cases. Furthermore, the city had the lowest mortality rate in its entire history during the year.

The average number of arrests for intoxication for the two years preceding prohibition was 29,754, while for 1920 and 1921 the average was 18,081.

Anti-Beer Act Upheld by Court

In Brooklyn the other day the Piel Brothers, brewers, made application for an injunction restraining the federal authorities from interfering with them in the manufacture of beer for medical purposes. The judge denied the application, however, holding that the enactment of the Willis-Campbell Act was a proper exercise of the authority vested in Congress to enact laws to accomplish effective enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment.

London Dockers Boycott Beer

It is reported that the dockyards area of London, England, has virtually gone "dry" as the result of the dockers' boycott on beer recently ordered by the Transport Workers' Federation as a vigorous protest against the action of the brewers in reducing wages and still keeping up the price of beer. Officials of the federation report that men who for years have drunk beer by the gallon have stopped drinking entirely.

Undertakers Suffer Under Prohibition

The year just closed, according to the New York health commissioner, Royal S. Copeland, has marked the lowest general death rate and the lowest infant death rate ever recorded in New York City. The general death rate was considered phenomenally low in 1920, being 12.93 per 1,000 of the population, but last year it went still lower—11.17 per 1,000 of the population. The infant death rate was 71.1 per 1,000, the lowest rate ever reached by any great city. In 1920 it was 85 per 1,000.

Medical Colleges Cannot Get Enough Bodies For Work

The statement made some time ago in regard to other medical colleges is repeated by the dean of the College of Medicine of the University of Illinois, Dr. Eycleshymer, who is quoted in a recent issue of the American Issue. He states that it is impossible to obtain anything like the proportionate number of bodies for anatomical purposes that the college was accustomed to getting before prohibition went into effect, when in the late winter and early spring especially there were a large number of people dying from pneumonia and similar diseases. His explanation is that in other days the alcoholics who became exposed to severe changes during those months contracted pneumonia and were unable to withstand it. He is authority, also, for the statement that there is the same shortage all over the country.

> Our safety and happiness lie in obedience to law by every man, woman and child within the domain of our Republic, and no one can undermine respect for law without being, to that extent, an enemy to law and orderly government.
> —Hon. H. M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States.

Moving Pictures Should Promote Prohibition

The moving picture industry is swinging into line for law enforcement, according to Federal Prohibition Commissioner Haynes. The Milwaukee (Wisconsin) Journal says that the commissioner's attention was recently called to the fact that not long ago, in one of the leading motion picture studios, the participants in an elaborate dining room scene were grouped around the table when someone remarked that something was missing. Another of the group volunteered, "It's the wine glasses."

"We are living in prohibition days and there will be no wine glasses in this picture," the director replied.

"When this care generally prevails in the industry," said Mr. Haynes, "and all elements which might suggest thoughtlessness in regard to high ideals, law and order, are eliminated, we may look forward to a new day in the inculcation through this medium of higher ideals and purposes, which will mean better citizenship."

Americanization Work Among Hotel Employes

The American Hotel association is just entering the field of Americanization. Classes were recently started in one of Chicago's largest hotels with an enrollment of 60, chiefly waiters, porters and workers from the housekeeping and chefs' departments.

Famous Winery to Become Health Resort

According to the San Francisco Chronicle, it is rumored that several big interests have been negotiating for the well-known Ruby Hill vineyard, located in Livermore Valley, California, with the idea of establishing a health resort there. The government recently purchased 227 acres of the Cresta Blanca ranch, which is about two miles from the Ruby Hill site, and has in contemplation the construction of an immense hospital for its sick service men. The thermal belt of the Livermore Valley has gained much prominence through the cases of tuberculosis that have been successfully treated.

New Commissioner of Law Enforcement in Chicago a Minister

A few weeks ago, because of the lawless conditions prevailing in the city of Chicago, Mayor William Hale Thompson put in office a law enforcement commissioner, Rev. John H. Williamson, whose chief work is to be the enforcement of the prohibition law. In announcing the appointment, the mayor appealed to "every school, every church and every temple of justice in the city" to teach respect for the law, and to all parents to co-operate in making the campaign for law and order a success.

The first move made by Dr. Williamson was the undertaking of a survey of the situation in the city. The next was a meeting held in the city's council chambers for the purpose of discussing ways and means of best carrying on the campaign. To this were invited civic, social and religious workers of the city. Addresses were made by the mayor, the corporation counsel, the chief of police, and the new commissioner. The last named speaker reminded his audience that there are ten thousand criminals in the city but that with the rest of the population united for good, lawlessness need not be rampant. "Under our system of government," said the speaker, "there exists no right of revolution against the law, and he who says that he will not obey the law is striking at the very cornerstone of our free republic and is unworthy of the blessings of citizenship in our beloved land."

It is expected that citizens' committees will be organized at once in each neighborhood, these to be fused into a large organization for united action.

Law Enforcement and Child Welfare

The danger in violating the prohibition law has been strikingly brought home to the individual parent by South Dakota's prohibition director, Isaac Pearson, who is thus quoted by the Sioux Falls (South Dakota) Argus-Leader:

"It is generally admitted that national prohibition has already accomplished great good. The predictions of its advocates have not been disappointed. Yet it must be admitted that the ideal has not been reached. There is much to be done. No one believed absolutely prohibition could or would be realized in a few short years. Indeed its greatest benefits will accrue to succeeding generations. How soon and in what measure the fullest benefits will be secured depends on the activity of the residents of the smallest political subdivisions of the state looking to law enforcement and law obedience.

"If a father should indulge in moonshining or bootlegging what a horrible example he sets before his sons! How can he compel them to law obedience? If they should become hold-up men, mail robbers, burglars, or automobile thieves, may not they reply, 'We are no worse than you, for we are alike offenders against the laws of both state and nation'? Nor is he who buys from the bootlegger to satisfy his appetite for strong drink any the less a real offender, for he contributes to the maintenance of a criminal in his nefarious business. One who informs another where he may buy liquors is also an offender."

AMERICANS DO NOT KNOW THE FOREIGNER

Culla J. Vayhinger, National Director Americanization

"The welcome and treatment received by European newcomers to America at Ellis Island has up to this time been scandalous, and did not in the least tend to draw the immigrant towards this country, to interest him, to give him a good understanding of America, or to encourage him to study the language of the country, its social and political institutions and its form of government. On the contrary, everything was done to discourage the immigrant, to kill the flame of sympathy which he felt, coming over to the dreamed of 'country of freedom.'"

"The greatest fault with the Americans is that they do not know the foreigners, that they do not try to know them, that they do not want to see or recognize those things which are good, noble and worthy of support in the foreigners; that they consider themselves superior to 'that immigrant mob'; that they regard every immigrant as an ignoramus, a being that cannot think right, or cannot feel as the Americans. This placing of himself so far above the immigrant by the average American, is the main obstacle in the way of coming to an understanding of each other—this is America's great misfortune." (This from Dzicnnik Zwiazowy, Polish Independent, Chicago, Ill.)

Such criticisms as these coming from our friendly foreign-language newspapers, are probably not pleasant for the "average American" to read, and yet if they spur us to a wholesome activity by giving us a better understanding of our duties and possibilities, then we should welcome them. We must plead guilty to the charge that we do not know these newcomers, and that many of us do not care to know them, as proven by the "for sale" signs on the homes of Americans when the foreign family moves in next door; that we have not been as active at Ellis Island in our efforts to give them the first lesson in Americanism by showing them the brotherly spirit as we should have been; that we have, many of us, forgotten our own foreign extraction and under-rated the foreigner's mental and moral worth—but we beg the editors of these foreign papers to look about them and see how much better we are behaving than we used to and to note that there has been a great awakening among the "average Americans" and that these newcomers are having placed in their reach today many of the advantages which will, if they grasp them, make their dream of America as the "country of freedom" a reality. May this criticism stir white ribboners to greater activity in manifesting to those newcomers next door to them the true, Christian American spirit. Be a neighbor and friend to the foreign woman within your reach.

AMERICANIZATION NOT A COMEDY

Theo. Whiting

Instead of the "Comedy of Americanization," an article thus titled, which appeared in the Saturday Evening Post, should be called "The Tragedy of Americanization." Nothing makes the situation so serious as the fact that native Americans are so cock-sure of themselves and their rights and the duties which accompany those rights.

John Daniels in a recent book, "America Via the Neighborhood," has given this excellent rule by which to measure the quality and quantity of Americanization—"The essence of Americanization is constructive participation in community life."

Recently I saw a most striking illustration of this definition. At a small town in the west two young men boarded my train. They were followed by a man of whom I thought at once, "He is their father. How fine for the three to travel together. It is not often that is the case. Usually the father rushes off on business trips and the boys of this age are in high school or college. How happy they must all be!"

As they came nearer, I noticed the young men walked with a peculiar gait, and I heard a clinking sound. Looking at them more closely, I observed upon the wrist of each a gleaming metal ring with a chain connection. Their ankles were similarly bound together. The boys slipped into a seat opposite me while the older man took one facing them, exhibiting no paternal pride but rather the watchfulness of a sheriff. The boys' heads hung forward; their eyes were not ready to meet his gaze. They had failed to constructively participate in community life and had gone farther and taken a destructive part in some way. Lawbreakers—mere boys with faces still youthful and innocent!

As I looked at them, my heart heavy—heavy for them and for their mothers—I saw coming down the car with head erect, eyes flashing, and walking with firm, trained step, a boy of about their age, in our country's uniform. He had done his bit of constructive work in time of war and was still "carrying on."

All three were Americans, each had had his chance, yet in some way one had chosen to build while the others had helped to destroy.

For constructive participation in the building of the nation, we need a common language, trained minds, high ideals, and unselfish devotion. Can lofty principles be instilled by ridicule, by contempt, by neglect?

The man who declared to me, "I belong to the best Americanization organization I know," and when asked what he meant replied, "Because we will let none but one hundred per cent Americans join" had a small standard of Americanism.

Who are "one hundred per cent Americans"? Not those whose eyes are riveted upon the past as they bask in the glory of deeds and dollars of their ancestors; not those who shout "personal liberty" as they boldly evade the law; not those who wrap their robes of complacency about them and ignore the ignorant, the destitute, the stranger within our gates; not those who allow criticism and hatred to rankle in their hearts because their neighbor differs from them in creed, in politics, in culture, in language; but those who fearlessly look ahead, bravely taking a stand for law observance and law enforcement, forgetting self and endeavoring to bring about the square deal for all, those who take an active part in sustaining and constructing community and national life—they are the ones who are "one hundred per cent Americans."

We native Americans are often in need of Americanization. We need to re-receive as well as give; to learn as well as teach; to work with, not for, others; to show our ideals by earnest, honest living; to censure less and encourage more; to give the New Americans a chance for decent living, for education, for a living wage, to see America at her best rather than her worst, to become intelligent loyal citizens of this, the best country in the world—best because it has stood in the past and stands today for Christian ideals and, if we constructively participate, ever will stand for opportunity, for fair play, for the observance of Christ's golden rule in custom and in law.

When we place first things first, when we individually and nationally give ourselves and our money willingly for education—not for our personal education but for the education of all, child, adult, black and white—for child welfare, for the care of mothers, for developing community life, social, spiritual, and moral; when we recognize that these are as important as war, roads, monuments, and sky-scrapers—then Americanization will be neither a comedy nor a tragedy but a serious business in which the school child and the governor, the son of the Pilgrim Fathers and the newest pupil in the citizenship class, the member of the Woman's Club and the Missionary Society, as well as the washwoman who dries her hands before she takes her lesson in English when the home teacher calls—will all be engaged—this business which calls for the highest qualifications and brings the largest returns—the business of building America.

MEXICO'S NEW DAY

Anna Adams Gordon, President National and World's W. C. T. U.

That Spain is to furnish text-books on alcohol acceptable to the Mexican government for use in her schools, is the information given us by Dr. Andres Osuna of Mexico City. Dr. Osuna, governor of this province under Carranza's presidency, was also head of the Department of Education. Wise, genial, great-hearted and a lover of his people, Dr. Osuna is an outstanding figure in the educational and temperance work in Old Mexico. The books about which Dr. Osuna is most enthusiastic are "Peligros del Alcohol" by Dr. Garcia del Real and "Bebidas Alcoholicas" by Drs. Piga y Marinon.

Within a few days after my arrival, through the courtesy of Dr. Osuna and Rev. Epigmenio Velasco, who will be remembered as Mexico's official representative at the International Congress against Alcoholism in Washington, D. C., September 21-26, 1920, I enjoyed meeting in conference the temperance leaders of this city. Dr. John Howland, beloved and revered for his long years of missionary and educational service in Mexico under the Congregational Board of Missions, presided. It was a "think-out-loud" conference concerning a program for the women of the Republic whose W. C. T. U. work, like all other lines of educational and social welfare activities, has been handicapped the past few years by disturbed conditions. Fortunately two bishops of the Methodist Church North are at the present moment in Mexico City—the resident bishop, Bishop W. B. Thirkield, and Bishop A. W. Leonard of California who leads the Epworth League movement of the world. Both of the bishops attended the conference and strongly endorsed the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. One subsequent meeting of women, representing all church denominations, has been held and a second is called for a few days hence, when it is believed the program will be fully outlined and officers chosen for the national W. C. T. U. of Mexico and for the local union of Mexico City.

Mexico is all astir for a broad system of education of the masses as well as greatly extended primary work. President Obregon, Senor Calles, head of the Department of the Interior, Hon. Adolfo do la Huerta, Secretary of Finance, and Hon. Licenciado Jose Vascoucelos of the department of Education are all out and out-ers for temperance education and for ridding Mexico of the alcohol menace. Senator Herminio S. Rodriguez, who, with his charming wife, attended and participated in the conference, stated that in September, in the coming session of Congress, a measure will be introduced aimed at doing away with the blighting pulque industry. In just what form the legislation will be introduced has not been determined.

The new book of contest recitations, made possible under the grant to the Mexico W. C. T. U. from our Jubilee Fund, contains a stirring reading furnished by Prof. Vascoucelos of the Board of Education. It is an arraignment of what he terms, the "Pulque Aristocracy" a reminder of our "King Alcohol."

The magnificent work of the Methodists in this section of Old Mexico, also of the Baptists and Presbyterians, is beyond all praise. It has been a joy to visit the Sara L. Keen College and the Bible School now connected with it, and to become acquainted with the two gifted directoras, Miss Carrie M. Purdy and Miss Helen Grace Murray and the associated teachers. The first industrial school attempted by the Methodists is a great success. Farming, dressmaking, millinery and home economics find eager students at the delightful Farm School in the suburbs of the city. Miss Rosetta Rodgers, sister of Mrs. Dwight Furness, is the able directora, and Miss Thomas, a live wire on the farm or in the school, shares with Miss Rodgers the heavy responsibilities.

> There are bands of ribbon white around the world, and you and I, bound by their pure, white clasp, thank God and take courage to wage our peaceful war "for God and home and everyland." We belong! Let every lip echo the words; let every heart cherish them.

The largest Mexican Methodist Church and its many co-operating agencies, book store, Bible classes and theological school, is at Calle Gante 5, and its pastor is Rev. Epigmenio Velasco. Aiding most capably in this busy center of Christian activities are Miss Mary W. Pearson and Miss Grace L. Duryea. On Sunday evening last, I had the pleasure of speaking to this congregation and in the evening, at the Union American Church, of which Rev. William E. Thomas is pastor. Another Methodist Church splendidly equipped and with a fine membership of Mexican people is the Balderas Church, where a rousing welcome reception was given Bishop Leonard.

One ought not to feel lonely in this beautiful old city, for Americans are everywhere and the hospitable kindness shown a new-comer by missionaries and Mexican people alike has been wonderfully generous.

Mexico City is radiant with sunshine and marvelously beautiful are the mountains that surround it from which tower the two famous snow-capped peaks, "Popo,"—Popocatepetl on the right, and "Ixte,"—Ixtla-Cihuatl on the left. "Ixte" is known as "The Lady in White." What a tale these mighty mountains could unfold! The Aztecs, the Spaniards, the Mexicans—the ever changing scenes in this country of romance and bloodshed.

A new day has come to our neighbor republic. We should rejoice that the W. C. T. U. has, with God's blessing, had a share in bringing it.

Thank God, a new day has come to Old Mexico!

A FEW INTERESTING DETAILS CONCERNING THE WORK OF THE IOWA CHILD WELFARE RESEARCH STATION

Luella Jones

The Iowa Child Welfare Research Station, to the support of which the Woman's Christian Temperance Union contributes, is gradually widening its circle of influence. Members of the staff are being frequently asked to give lectures and to hold conferences for the discussion of child welfare problems. Troubled mothers write for advice, teachers from all states in the Union ask how they may more efficiently study the children in their charge and help to adjust them to school environment. Parent-Teacher circles are planning programs for a study of nutrition and normal development in which mothers and teachers may work together toward making children happy and healthy. Public health centers write for a chance to co-operate with the research station in proper and scientific methods of relief.

Dr. Bird T. Baldwin, director of the station, receives many requests to give public lectures telling what Iowa is doing for its children, and to confer with parents and teachers on the normal child in its proper social relation at home and at school. His monumental book, "The Physical Growth of Children from Birth to Maturity," has already caused scientists and educators to make a new evaluation of school methods. We are learning that a third important factor in fitting the child into his right place for normal development is the physiological age—a factor of equal importance with chronological and mental age.

"The physiologically more mature child has different attitudes, different types of emotions, different interests from the child who is physically younger, though of the same chronological age."

Dr. Lorle I. Stecher has a set of slides with which she gives interesting and helpful lectures illustrating the work of the Child Welfare Station.

Dr. Daniels, research professor of nutrition, has been asked to address several public conferences on medical study, and in addition to her work with babies in the laboratory at the Children's Hospital, she gives counsel to mothers by mail, directing the feeding of infants for several months at a time.

Wide-awake teachers from all parts of the United States write to ask the significance of our Studies in Child Welfare, indicating a desire to adapt new principles to the needs of school children. Many of them ask for the Height-Weight charts in order to study the proper physical growth of pupils. One of the most hopeful tendencies of the day is the splendid way in which mothers and teachers are trying to make the home and school supplement each other. There is an increasing number of well-informed parents who assume their share of responsibility in educating their children, and they are eager to do so in the most approved way. Not a little credit for this new spirit of co-operation is due to the patient work of the community nurse. That greatest educational progress can be attained only when the child has a healthy body, properly nourished, is gaining recognition.

The recent series of articles in The Delineator has brought an avalanche of inquiries from forty or more states where teachers and parents have expressed a desire to open child welfare campaigns in their own respective states or communities.

So the circle widens and educators are passing on the torch from one to another; the child who is the most dependent, yet the most important, member of society, is coming to his own.

W. C. T. U. HISTORY IN THE MAKING

"IT IS THE WAY COMMERCE HAS MARCHED ACROSS THE CONTINENTS AND CAPTURED THEM FOR CIVILIZATION—ONE BY ONE; IT IS THE WAY AN ARMY IS RECRUITED—ONE BY ONE; IT IS THE WAY CHRIST'S CHURCH IS BUILT UP INTO POWER, AND HEAVEN ADDS TO ITS SOULS REDEEMED—JUST ONE BY ONE"

One-City-to-a-State Meetings Prove Popular and Profitable

Reports received from the first and second series of conferences being held under the auspices of the state unions and the National W. C. T. U. evidence their success.

From Maine comes the word: "I am most happy to tell you of the success of the conference. The speakers, Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger and Mrs. Deborah K. Livingston, were superb. Their messages were direct and tangible and our women greatly helped."

This message comes from Missouri: "The conference in Kansas City was a great success and we thank Mother National for sending us such fine helpers as Mrs. Elizabeth Perkins and Mrs. Laura Miller. The people were delighted with both and they did us a world of good."

A telegram from Mississippi speaks of the meeting as enthusiastic and the national speakers as most interesting.

Arkansas writes that the meeting at Mansfield was well attended, and that the national speakers captivated the audiences. A state prohibition director, who "loved to be quizzed" furnished an added attraction. Many new members were enlisted as the result of the conference.

If you live in the vicinity of the cities where the meetings of the third or fourth series are to be held do not fail to be present. You will be well repaid for the effort and expense of attending the gathering.

Second Program in March

Theme—Women and Politics. Women are appointed to many places of responsibiliy in the State and National Government.

Discussion—To what positions have women been elected or appointed in your State? In the nation? What have they accomplished? In what issues are they most interested, and how do they get these issues before the people?

Who's Who in the W. C. T. U.

The Methodist Episcopal Church recently honored Mrs. Althea G. Quimby, president of the Maine W. C. T. U., by licensing her as a local preacher. This is the highest recognition accorded women by the Methodist church and confers the title of reverend.

A member of the Pennsylvania state legislature, the Hon. J. T. Davis, attended a medal contest and was so impressed with its educational value that he has offered to present a medal to each union in the county holding a contest under the auspices of the W. C. T. U.

In a membership contest recently held in the Huntington Park (California) W. C. T. U., 123 new paid-up members were secured. The contest also was the means of arousing new interest among the old members.

Mrs. Kathleen Norris, the noted magazine writer and novelist, recently joined the Mill Valley (California) W. C. T. U.

The idea of the white star Law Observance window card came from an article written by Mrs. Norris for McCall's Magazine. She has indicated her desire to help in the coming referendum campaign in California by speaking for the dry law.

During the course of the program at the monthly meetings of the Grand Crossing (Ill.) W. C. T. U., its members are busily occupied in sewing rags of all the colors of the rainbow, to be taken to a nearby soldiers' hospital. They are used by the convalescent service men in the making of artistic rugs, and the proceeds from their sale provides the semi-invalids with much appreciated spending money.

The Sandersville (Ga.) L. T. L. recently had a most attractive exhibit in the window of the public library. Wild smilax was used as a background for the pictures of Frances E. Willard and Mary Harris Armor and a beautiful bow of white. A temperance pledge chain was suspended from the corners to the center of the window. In the foreground were pictured two homes, the miserable abode of the drunkard's family contrasted with the comfortable home of the man who does not waste his substance in strong drink.

The Indiana W. C. T. U. is appealing for a fund of $3,000 with which to carry on a campaign of publicity and definite work to help to keep the Volstead Law and for the placing of dry men in charge of enforcement of the prohibitory law and prosecution of offenders.

HAVE THESE FACTS REPRINTED IN YOUR LOCAL PAPERS

The pro-liquor press are saying that prohibition is a failure and that conditions are worse than before the Eighteenth Amendment was adopted. The only way to counteract the effect of such statements is to give wide publicity to the REAL news about prohibition. You can do this by getting the following facts published in your local newspapers. Will you do it? EDITOR.

1. Two years of national prohibition has reduced the number of drinkers of alcoholic beverages from 20,000,000 to 2,500,000, a decrease of 17,500,000, says Federal Prohibition Commissioner Haynes.

2. Only 15 per cent of former drinkers are drinking now and these are drinking but five per cent the quantity of liquor that was formerly consumed, says Federal Prohibition Commissioner Haynes.

3. The same authority states that the entire drink bill of the nation has decreased $2,000,000,000 a year. This money formerly spent for drink has gone into savings banks or has been spent in legitimate lines for necessary commodities.

4. The year 1921, the second of the prohibition regime, was the healthiest in the United States, according to figures submitted by thirty-seven leading insurance companies transacting about 80 per cent of the life insurance business of the country.

5. The Federal Comptroller of th Currency is authority for the statemer that more than 600 mutual savings bank show gains both in number of depositor and volume of deposits during the la fiscal year. Prominent banks in ever section of the country testify that prol bition has promoted the thrift moveme as shown by increased savings.

6. Judge Kent Greene, president of t Washingtonian Home Association, th oldest operating association of its ki in America, is reported to have said th the Chicago home is the only one o of sixty or more in the country to su vive and that its slim patronage mak its future doubtful.

7. The report of the Board of Charit of the District of Columbia for the fis year 1921 shows a continued decline the population of the workhouse a other correctional and reform institutio The chairman of the committee on formatories and Correctional Institutio and others, says: "The most encour ing fact to be noted in connection w the workhouse is that during the p t year, the daily average of prisoners s only 208 as compared with 334 the ceding year. This is the lowest num r recorded since the establishment of e new workhouse at Occoquan, eleven y rs ago."

BY THE GRACE OF THE COMMON PEOPLE

Eleanor Gridley—Author of "From the Log Cabin to the White House"

Not long ago a popular magazine, devoted mainly to women's interests, published two articles, one in favor of prohibition and the other against it, each written by a well known woman.

Mrs. Gertrude Atherton, of brilliant literary achievement, attacked prohibition by asserting that it interferes with personal liberty.

Does personal liberty consist in gratifying one's desire for pleasure, no matter how harmful such self-indulgence may be? Does personal liberty consist in living as one may choose without restraint, however wrong, or infamous, one's conduct? Is this mode of life personal liberty?

To be a law unto oneself would set at naught personal obligation. The disregard of personal obligation is against economic policy, because moral collapse would follow, and over the grave of blasted justice and shattered hopes there would arise a gigantic monument on which would sit enthroned the human Spirit of Evil.

It seems to me that Mrs. Atherton's syllogism will appeal only to the catch-me-quick mind. To the rank and file of serious thinking men and women, especially mothers, it contains no alluring flights of conviction.

Every well informed person knows that the use of intoxicants not only has a deleterious effect on the physical body but also undermines and destroys the moral character.

The most pernicious custom of the civilized races is the "drink habit." It arouses the most vicious and shameless instincts. It renders its victims unwholesome, dishonest, untruthful, licentious, worthless and in every way irresponsible. The sweet, beautiful young woman becomes a disgusting, repulsive old hag; the strong, vigorous young man a tottering, shambling old man. It has a mad bewitchment for the weak, the lawless, the untrustworthy, luring them on to deeds of violence—robbery, murder and vile attacks upon defenseless women and helpless little girls. It makes the home a place as undesirable as the infernal regions, driving the mother to desperation and the children out into the public highways. It has broken up more homes than any other one cause. It is claimed that these conditions are only brought about through the excessive use of liquor, but ask the victims of the "habit" and invariably they will declare they are moderate drinkers.

Mrs. Atherton's charge against the use of ice water and chocolate would be amusing were it not so pathetically weak. Was ever a reeling sailor lad, or staggering soldier boy, drunk on ice water; was ever a blear-eyed besotted old wanton drunk on chocolate; was ever a maudlin derelict drunk on ice water; was ever an infant made feeble, deformed, distorted, suffering because its father was drunk on ice water or its mother's milk poisoned with chocolate?

Mrs. Atherton also opines that those who entertain views that conflict with hers on the subject of prohibition have warped and bigoted minds. Do we agree with the lady? Hardly, for there are many, many who have not forgotten that wonderful army of pioneer men and women who went forth to conquer a powerful and relentless foe. The campaign was an intelligent and well-directed line of assault with willing forces mobilized for heroic attack. The enemy claimed to be invincible. It boasted of having at its command uncountable numbers, unassailable strength and untold wealth. The guns on the enemy's firing line blazed out hellish shot of sneering taunts, insulting innuendoes, malicious falsehoods, cunning strategy. There was, however, no decoying of the valiant band nor dismay in its ranks. With hearts afire, eyes aflame with the glorious vision and souls attuned to triumphal song, this soldier host went marching on to victory.

The prohibition craft is now launched, afloat and well manned. It fears no foe and carries at its mast head the banner on which is inscribed, "Thou shalt not brew."

Why not prohibit the manufacture of a product that paralyzes the body, befogs the mind and destroys the spiritual nature? Why not prohibit the making of that which turns a man into a beast, vile and disgusting; a woman, into a creature, disgraceful and dissolute?

If the manufacture of fireworks, which also maimed, crippled, killed, has been prohibited, is there any reason why the manufacture of the most widely used and most universally destructive product should not be prohibited? Upon the other hand, is there a single good or valid reason why the maddening draught, humanity's greatest curse since the first dawn of existence, should be manufactured and dealt out to the unemancipated children of earth?

Mrs. Atherton closes her panegyric with a powerful (?) climax, when she says, "Prohibition can no more be enforced than personal liberty—love or hate—because it attacks a primary need" and to that assertion adds an imperious command, "Let there be no mistake about that."

Many of those splendid men and women—the common people—who zealously espoused the cause have entered the celestial home but their work lives on, like a pillar of fire leading the way; the memory of their sacrifices is imperishable, like the beauty and fragrance of a new blown rose. This vanished army have entrusted to their devoted followers a sacred heritage—the guarding of our citadal, a worthy temple of giant strength and exquisite symmetry.

Abraham Lincoln said, "God must love the common people because he has made so many of them." Let us also believe that God is still creating, with infinite care and love, His largest crop of humanity, the common people.

The Eighteenth Amendment has now become a part of our governing power. We should neither doubt nor assail the loyalty of our commonwealth. Let us have an abiding faith that the preservation of the Constitution of the United States, the supreme law of the land, and the enforcement of its mandates will ever be the Will of the Common People.

"FOR THEIR SAKES"---PROPHECIES FROM THE PRESS

After all, why have the women of the land worked for lo, these many years for the coming of prohibition? Is it merely for their own sakes, that they might lead happier lives? The asking of the question is all that is needed. For after the example of Him who said: "For their sakes I sanctify Myself," men and women of the past generations have labored for prohibition and their followers are now striving to enforce it that their children may "enter into their labors." In this connection, the forward look by the press is perhaps of special interest.

The benefits that will accrue to the coming generations are referred to in certain journals, such as the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, which assevcrates that "Undoubtedly a large majority of American children under three years of age are destined never to see a saloon such as once existed in every neighborhood and on nearly every corner," and the Albuquerque (New Mexico) Herald states, even more emphatically in regard to the present opposition to the law that "These things will pass. The next generation of citizens will no more think of returning hard liquor to a legal status in this country than this generation would think of legalizing the traffic in opium and cocaine."

"After a few generations of prohibition, with alcohol increasingly hard to get, there'll come a generation without any craving for liquor," says the far-sighted South Bend (Indiana) Times. "That generation will be normally healthy and happy, in body, mind and spirit. Prohibition will be easy to enforce then."

And this most potent of all reasons for continued efforts is stressed by the Anaheim (California) Herald in the prophecy, "There is a generation growing up and there are generations to be born that will benefit by the prohibition of liquor. If substantial advantage comes to them, the present generation may well forego some of its 'personal liberty.' There is a reason for all the whisky propaganda. The reason is profit. And profit at the cost of human happiness is not a good reason."

The Pueblo (Colorado) Journal compares the effectiveness of the prohibition law with other laws, reminding us that "no law is entirely effective," and that "laws curb crime, but they do not absolutely prevent it." Then it goes on in a distinctly optimistic mood: "When the stocks of liquor on hand when the country became dry are consumed there will be a noticeable improvement in the dry situation. Indifference of juries, failure of officials to properly enforce the laws, and alliance of respectable persons with bootleggers who supply liquor, combine to make conditions which prevent proper enforcement of the laws. In time these conditions will vanish. There will be an insistence on the part of the general public that the laws be enforced, and those who fail to enforce them will be banished from official positions and their places taken by persons in sympathy with dry laws and not afraid to enforce them against rich and poor alike."

In an editorial entitled, "The Bootlegger Is no Longer a Hero," the Davenport (Iowa) Democrat, referring to conditions in the country at large, says, "So often, of late, have the bootleggers been murderers in everything except explicit intention that even the most thirsty have

In reply to questions coming to the editor's desk as to the record on prohibition legislation of United States Senators and Congressmen who may be candidates for re-election, we would state that the National department of Legislation, Mrs. Lenna Lowe Yost, National superintendent, Bliss Building, Washington, D. C., will upon request furnish information as to the vote of any Senator or Representative as recorded on Federal prohibition bills.

A very artistic sticker has been designed by the Pennsylvania W. C. T. U. for use in advertising the coming World's W. C. T. U. Convention, to meet in Philadelphia, next fall. The sticker is in blue and gold, and shows the figure of a young woman in Grecian draperies, holding above her head the world encircled by a white ribbon. It bears the inscription, "World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Academy of Music, November 11-16, Philadelphia, Pa., U. S. A." These stickers may be ordered from Mrs. J. B. Scott, 503 South Forty-sixth St., Philadelphia, at $3.00 per thousand, 50 cents a hundred. It is hoped they will be widely used. Children will like to paste them on their school books, and travelers upon their suit cases. They can be placed upon letters and parcels. Let us use them generously to advertise the coming World's W. C. T. U. Convention.

Prepare For the Primaries

In several states the primaries are held in the early spring months, April and May. How is it in your state? Look up the date and be sure to cast your ballot, that the right candidates may be nominated. It is vitally important that good citizens attend the primaries to prepare the way for dealing with the vitally important issues we are facing.

Temperance Sunday Draws Near!

Any local union that fails to arrange for an enthusiastic observance of the next Temperance Sunday, March 12, is missing a great opportunity. One big city Bible school is planning to have prominent physicians speak before the school on the truths of science concerning the danger from the alcohol habit and the injury from wine and beer drinking. If you cannot get the doctors to give the message you can distribute literature on the subject. Make March 12 a "Think-it-Over" day on the liquor question, for all attendants at our Bible schools, and especially on the criminal folly of permitting the traffic in wine and beer.

Tribute to Frances E. Willard Printed in Congressional Record

The address to the memory of Frances E. Willard, delivered by Congressman A. P. Nelson of Minnesota, at the meeting on February 17, in Statuary Hall, the Capitol, Washington, D. C., has been printed in the Congressional Record of February 18. "The three paramount forces of our civic and national glory—the intellectual, the ethical, and the spiritual—found their highest expression in the noble life and labor of Frances E. Willard," said Congressman Nelson. "With her high moral nature, she infused into her activities a moral and spiritual atmosphere that caused the seeds of noble character to blossom into the flowers of brave and illustrious deeds. She led in the great task of making the principles of the meek and lowly Nazarene a living, breathing, and pulsating power in our civic, state and national life."

Our Dreams

"You find that all men who dreamed backed their dreams with deeds. For a time we were so busy making money that we forgot our dreams. And when foreigners came crowding to our shores, we did not care whether they were good Americans or not. All we cared was to have them work in our mills and factories and in our kitchens and let us alone in our pride of ancestry and pomp of circumstance. We forgot to show them Bunker Hill and to tell them about the old North Church and Paul Revere and the shot heard round the world, and what liberty means, and democracy."

The foregoing indictment, by the hero of one of the better class novels of the day, is thought-compelling. Dreams may seem very fragile material out of which to build an enduring democracy, a single, weak tool with which to fashion the Kingdom of Heaven. Yet it must be admitted that whenever the dreamers of the world have "backed up their dreams with deeds," we have found that their dreams were well worth while. A most casual glance backward will show us that we owe a host of advantages of modern life to those who dreamed. The dreams of Harriet Beecher Stowe and others banished slavery; the dreams of Frances E. Willard strengthened her to refuse worldly advancement and to labor for that which today has found expression in law, state and national, against the manufacture and sale of liquor.

How many of us have thought we owe it to the new Americans to give them dreams too? Because of their early environment, many of them are without the knowledge which forms the background of the dream fabric, and most of them have come to us with only confused ideas. Shall we not, while acting as "W. C. T. U. Neighbors," tell them some of the stories of our heroes? Not the tales of war, for we must educate them along lines of peace; not the accounts of fabulous wealth, for wealth, even when rightly gained, does not necessarily bring happiness; not the stories of those who, by falsehood, or deceit, or graft, have come to places of prominence. Let us speak of the heroes of peace, the great and good of the land, those whom we love for their likeness to Christ—those who served their fellowmen. As we dwell upon these, our own hearts will be warmed anew, our own lives uplifted, and our brothers and sisters from other lands, seeing the light of sincerity in our faces, will have an inspiring glimpse of our ideals, and take them as their own.

NEVER AGAIN!

Margaret B. Platt

Just wine and beer. No saloons—oh, no—nobody wants the saloon back again. But wine and beer are all right. They are needed! Nothing can take their places! Pure fruit juices are too tame to suit the jaded taste of the alcohol addict! Just wine and beer—no saloon!

Well, the manufacture and sale of beer necessarily presuppose the return of the brewery in which to manufacture it, and some established place in which to sell it. A brewery will still be a brewery and the retail establishment will still be a saloon, call it by whatever euphonious title one may. "A rose by any other name," etc., and a saloon by any other name, no matter how sweet or dignified, will still be the same foul, malodorous, monstrous, accursed sink of iniquity and den of vice that it always has been. The brewers and their vassals will return to their former place of vantage as political bosses; the nomination of candidates for official positions will again be subject to the approval or disapproval of the liquor oligarchy and our last state will be worse than the first, for having witnessed the return of the once condemned and outlawed business the blight of discouragement will overtake the world's temperance workers and a universal lethargy clog their efforts.

Will the American people be fooled by the whining appeals and the silly sophistry, the insidious, treacherous camouflaging of the brewers and their ilk? It is the wolf in sheep's clothing. It is the same old interest that for years cursed our country with its pernicious influences, filled our jails, our asylums, our poor-houses, our hospitals and our chain-gangs; blasted the lives of millions of men, women and children; devastated homes, suborned juries, drove honest judges from the bench, made a farce of justice, destroyed or changed election returns, and when reproached for their myriad sins against the people, its minions cried out, "To hell with the people; what do we care?"

Shall the breweries and their retail sales depots return? Given a licensed, revenue paying, established place of sale for wine and beer, it goes without saying that other intoxicants will there be found. Have the liquor interests ever obeyed any restrictive legislation? Have they lived in conformity with the Eighteenth Amendment? Have they obeyed the enforcement laws? Who are the saloon-keepers and boot-leggers today boldly carrying on their hateful activities, despite law, and snapping their fingers in the face of justice? Who are they? The same old gang. Would not whisky and other intoxicants be found as formerly along with wine and beer? Would not the "ladies' entrance" be the same old trail leading to perdition? Have we any reason to suppose that a depot for the sale of beer and wine would be conducted in accordance with the principles of patriotic Christian citizenship or even ordinary decency? Judging by the past history of wine and beer in every country we have no reason to believe that their nature and effects would be changed even by transferring their sale to church parlors or the prayer-meeting room.

Shall wine and beer come back? In the name of decency, patriotism and civilization, for the sake of the home and the child, and all that these mean to our country, for the sake of Christian America's example to the world, and for the sake of a common humanity, let the voters of this country declare from now until the ballots are cast in every primary and at the November election—"The liquor traffic in any guise, under any pretext, shall not return!"

"Never again! Never again!"

"For Their Sakes"

ceased, or are ceasing, to regard them as public benefactors, and have come, or are coming, to treat them as the miserable criminals they all are." "The Davenport editor is right," comments the Ottumwa (Iowa) Courier. "As the prohibition law gains in age it will gain, also, in the esteem of the people. There will be violators, perhaps, as long as daring and ingenious manufacturers of illicit beverages continue to ply their trade, but respectable society will frown more and more darkly on the 'hootch hound' as time goes on. And this is as it should be."

The editor of the Kalamazoo (Michigan) Gazette speaks of the urging by certain groups of citizens in certain states of referendums with a view to determining the opinion of the American people on the desirability of modifying the Eighteenth Amendment so that the manufacture and sale of light wines may be permitted. While he reminds his readers that "it is the privilege of a minority, and it is, too, an act of the highest citizenship under our form of government, to yield gracefully to the will of the majority in all forms of election," he wonders if it may not be "the part of discretion to permit the use of the safety valve by those who do not agree with this view (that prohibition was the wish of the majority), so that once and for all they may learn the truth, and the agitation they have been carrying on may be effectually ended." For, "once such a trial as that proposed now is finished, there can be no shadow of an excuse for any patriotic citizen to have anything more to do with the traffic."

"We have been socially rather tolerant of the presence of liquor on the understanding that it was 'cellar goods'—alcohol in the possession of those now using it at the time the prohibition enactment went into effect," says the Fresno (California) Republican. "That understanding is pretty well worn out. As a cloak for covering secret traffic in liquor, it is threadbare. The time is fast coming when possession of liquor will be evidence of participation in law defiance. And it is very near here when the use of liquor that has been obtained as medicine will be recognized as a sort of a petty thievery by the law."

Quoting the statement of Commissioner Haynes that, generally speaking, prohibition in this country is an immense success, and the law working effectively in more than nine-tenths of the United States, in spite of certain sections in the country where the law is being violated, the Watertown (South Dakota) Public Opinion refers to these "wet spots" as places where the insidious influence of the liquor interests in municipal politics makes it almost impossible to get more than ostensible attempts at enforcement from local officials, but asserts that not only are the Federal officials making headway in controlling the situation in these centers, but that "it is only a question of time when these will line up with the rest of the country and make 'boozing' socially unpopular as well as legally dangerous."

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awakening continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

If you then, imperfect as you are, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more will your Father in Heaven give good things to those who ask Him! Everything, therefore, be it what it may, that you would have men to do to you, do you also the same to them; for in this the Law and the Prophets are summed up.—Matt. 7:11-12, Weymouth's Edition.

Service

"Serve me."
"Twas the Father's voice,
And the brown thrush drooped his wing.
"Alas! Dost thou speak to me this word?
I cannot serve—such a wee brown bird."
But the Father answered,
"Sing."

"Serve me."
And the fountain heard,
It wept a cloud of spray.
"How can I serve Thee, mighty King?
And I such a light and useless thing?"
But the Father answered,
"Play."

"Serve me."
And the toiler paused,
And sadly looked above.
"How can I serve my God," he said.
"When my whole strength goes for my children's bread?"
But the merciful One said,
"Love."

So the brown thrush sang at the break of day
And the toiler heard as he passed that way.
And the fountain splashed in the dimpling pool.
The toiler drank of the water, cool.
A new strength came as he passed along,
And fatherhood sang in his heart, a song.

So each served God in God's own way.
But which served best, only He can say.

RED LETTER DAYS

March 20—Prohibition Rally Day (Birthday of General Neal Dow.)
April 14—Young People's Branch Day (Birthday of Frances J. Barnes.)

Southern California's Whirlwind Campaign

Julia D. Phelps,
State Vice-President-at-Large

Southern California W. C. T. U. began the work of the autumn and winter with two outstanding objectives—to double the membership and to raise the budget.

For the first time an annual budget was made to cover the expenses of the state in the support of the Frances E. Willard Home, the Home Center for Army and Navy at San Diego, and all the varied administration expenses of a live state organization. The estimate amounted to a sum equal to our membership. This budget plan was adopted at the state convention in May, 1921, and the state officers were charged with its execution.

In order to reach our goal every county in the state will be visited by some officer. Already Mrs. Eva C. Wheeler, president, and Mrs. Hattie C. Young, secretary, have put on a "whirlwind campaign" for members and money in eight counties, visiting each union, always leaving a doubled membership and money enough in the local treasury to meet the budget. Presidents have been found for weak unions, new unions organized, and the work everywhere strengthened.

A regional conference at which all unions came together for information and inspiration, closed each week of the campaign. Perhaps the most popular feature of these conferences has been the Law Enforcement afternoon when the question "How to Enforce the Eighteenth Amendment" was discussed by local speakers, "The Responsibility of the Church," by a pastor; "Temperance Teaching in the Schools, the Foundation," by a school man; "The Power of the Press," by an editor; "Methods of Enforcement," by an officer of the law; "What is My Duty?" by a citizen. Good audiences have gathered to hear this discussion and have gone away with a new idea of the breadth and force of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Evening and Sunday audiences have heard Mrs. Wheeler's recital of her experiences in "Lands under the Southern Cross," and have responded generously to the stirring appeal for money made by Mrs. Young. Various state speakers have assisted in the conferences.

In addition to this special effort, the regular work, under the direction of county presidents, goes steadily on. There is a fixed determination that California shall take her place among the states that support the Federal Constitution by a state law enforcing the Eighteenth Amendment. To this great object our hearts, our voices, our votes, are pledged, and the months between now and November will see the waging of a mighty campaign in support of the Wright law, California's enforcement law, under referendum by the liquor power and to be voted on at the November election.

Arizona Progressive Along W. C. T. U. Lines

Special Correspondence

The Spanish speaking W. C. T. U., which was organized in Tucson, Arizona, while Miss Theo Whiting, Americanization field worker, was there, is flourishing. It has added to its membership and adopted several departments of work.

Arizona W. C. T. U. rejoices that one of her senators, Henry F. Ashurst, supported the conference report on the wine and beer legislation.

Not long ago Mr. M. E. Cassidy was appointed Federal prohibition director for Arizona. The following extract is taken from his response to a communication sent to him by a white ribboner: "I wish to thank you for your offer of assistance, both on behalf of yourself and of the members of the W. C. T. U. The enforcement of the prohibition act in this state is a big proposition, and we need the assistance not only of the members of your organization, but of all good citizens who believe in the enforcement of the law regardless of their personal opinions on the question of prohibition."

Arizona has a splendid anti-cigaret law which was strengthened at the last session of the legislature by the insertion of a clause making it unlawful for a minor to have in his possession cigarets or tobacco. Mrs. Luella E. Thomas of Phoenix, state superintendent of this department, has done good work by having copies of the law distributed.

The last national convention was the first one at which Arizona's president, Mrs. Imogen LaChance, had the pleasure of having present with her other Arizona delegates. At that time, she was made by her state organization a national life member; and her three children (two of whom were also in attendance) placed her name in the Book of Remembrance.

Mrs. Leora Lobban Brewer, vice-president of the Arizona W. C. T. U., was made a national organizer at the San Francisco convention.

Work For Women in Industry Adds to Membership of Union

In ———, Connecticut, the local president asked a friend of hers to join the W. C. T. U. The friend refused and to the astonishment of Miss— went on to say, "You have a Women in Industry department and do not do anything." Miss— says, "She told me about infringements of factory laws personally known to her and asked me to do something about the matter.

"My resolution to call an evening meeting of our union for our members who are women in industry was strengthened by a phone call from another friend reporting lack of fire-escapes on a three-story frame factory, where results might be serious in case of fire.

"The factory inspector had meanwhile come to town, stopped minors' overtime work and improved sanitary conditions.

"The problem of the fire-trap I took up, through my pastor and the local fire chief, with the chief factory inspector in Hartford. Two more inspectors came to our town in response to this letter.

"Our evening meeting was very interesting. The two members who never could attend in the afternoon gave us first-hand information. Every one entered heartily into the debate, stimulated by eighteen prepared questions on the subject. The friend who refused membership has joined the union. We have obtained copies of laws regarding factories, etc and are going to work quietly, although I am sure both labor and capital would feel that a spirit of fairness and justice has pervaded our work from start to finish. We did not advertise the subject and have given no publicity to our work. We are trying to apply, 'Look Not Every Man on His Own Things, but Every Man Also on the Things of Other first to fellow workers, then to employers and the public."

Deans of Women's Colleges Talk on Girl Student Smokers

Deans of women's colleges appear to be unanimous in disapproval of smoking by girl students. As reported by the press, the following statements have been made by representatives of certain institutions of higher education:

The student body of Missouri University has laid down rules prohibiting smoking by coeds, and no instances of violation have been brought to the attention of the faculty, Miss Eva Johnston, dean of women, asserts. Miss Johnston said "no semblance of such a problem ever has arisen here."

"There are no inveterate smokers among the coeds at the University of Illinois, consequently there are no rules governing smoking," said Ruby E. C. Mason, dean of women at the university.

While there is no rule prohibiting smoking among the women of the University of Wisconsin, F. Louise Nardin, dean of women, said to a reporter, "There is an ethical principle held by coeds which is making the habit unpopular."

A coed caught smoking at Purdue University would be dismissed at once, declared Dean Carolyn Shoemaker.

"We have no rule against smoking by women here any more than we have a specified rule against lying or stealing," said Miss Anne Blitz, dean of women at the Kansas state university, in speaking of conditions at that particular institution. "Smoking by women here is a negligible problem. I attribute this to the sentiment throughout the state against women's smoking. The sororities here have strict rules against smoking and enforce them. They are a powerful aid in preventing smoking by girl students from becoming a problem."

Coeds at Washington University, St. Louis, Mo., agreed among themselves that smoking was a "foolish habit," said Miss Edith M. Fenton, dean of women, "and consequently it was unnecessary for the institution to promulgate any regulations on the subject."

Are Civic Affairs Among Your Paramount Interests?

"Henry Van Dyke, in his book, 'The Ruling Passion,' shows how every life has its keynote. It is guided by some primary motive that goes far to explain it. Just as a magnet draws to itself iron filings, so a ruling passion or interest brings order out of the days and works and weaves them into a seamless robe.

"An expert authority, in much the same way, says that the average American citizen has more than one dominant interest. He has several which he ought to examine in the order of their importance in his life. Possibly this catalogue of personal interests can be rearranged with profit. * * * * * *

"But few can doubt or deny that with most Americans civic duty comes last in the catalogue of personal concerns. Save in time of war, most Americans give only a meager remnant of attention to civic affairs. In this respect moderns do not measure up to the standard of citizenship set by the old Greeks and Romans. With them state affairs were a matter of religion, and came second only to concerns of family and livelihood.

"The low place which civic interest takes with the average American accounts for most of the failures and disappointments of democracy here. Waste and extravagance in government, corruption and malign influence, failure to enlist large numbers of the best citizens in the public service, are traced directly to the fact that civic affairs are last in the list of citizens' interests.

"Popular government rests upon the principle that every citizen owes it to himself and his community to make civic affairs one of his paramount interests. Every case of corruption, of jobbing contracts and malign influence, of poor municipal government and weak leadership, indicts the lethargy and indifference of 'good citizens'. If democracy fails in this country, it will be because the average American gives only a remnant of his time and attention to civic affairs."

"'A Mother-Son-Daughter' banquet with Mrs. Perkins as the guest of honor, was the feature of the first evening. Eighty persons were seated at the tables and from this number a full dozen fine, virile young people will be gained as members. Mrs. Perkins' address on this occasion, as well as on her other appearances in the city, called forth great enthusiasm. Seldom has a speaker so captured her audiences or left as much concrete information and such fine plans and methods to be developed. If she could have spared the time, a full week's engagements could have been made for her in the city. She was joined in Lincoln by Mrs. H. T. McNickle of Farnum, state Y. P. College Students Urge Ratification of Treaties

Thirty representatives of the National Student Committee for the Limitation of Armaments, one of the organizations co-operating in the National Council for Reduction of Armaments, were received by President Harding at the White House on February 20. The deputation, which represented 250 men's and women's universities and colleges, left with the President a report on resolutions passed independently at the various colleges and which endorsed: (1) Immediate ratification of the Conference treaties as definite steps toward a limitation of armaments by international agreement, and because failure to ratify would result in augmented distrust among nations; (2) American participation in the Genoa or a similar economic conference on condition that the agenda include balancing of European budgets, reduction of land armaments, breaking down of economic barriers and German reparations.

The National Student Committee is the first evidence of an effort among the undergraduates of this country to play such a part in our national and international policies as is played by the students of China, Japan, Germany and other foreign countries.

Chicago's Superintendent of Schools Makes a Few Suggestions

Forty-five thousand copies of a list of "taboos" will be printed and circulated among Chicago high school students.

These "taboos" have grown out of an investigation by Superintendent of Schools Peter A. Mortenson, resulting in recommendations by the board of education regarding the simple life of the high school student.

"We realize that about 98 per cent of the students are normal, sensible young people. We do not accuse them of excesses of any kind. But we want to prevent them from being led by the few silly, cheap, weak boys and girls who are in every school."

Student councils and self-government commissions operating in many high schools have brought some of the evidence on which the following suggestions are founded:

That young people of high school age should keep early hours and devote five evenings of each week to their studies.

That parents of high school students "should be invited to share in the patronage and chaperonage of all school functions."

That unrestricted use of automobiles is another demoralizing influence and parents who allow boys in their 'teens to take high school girls joy-riding are doing much to break down the moral standards of the community.

Kansas City Conference Inspires Anew Missouri Workers

Fannie L. Taylor

Kansas City W. C. T. U. comrades were given a double portion of benefits by the joining of our Jackson, Platt, Clay counties and Kansas City Federation group institute with the national one-city-to-a-state-meeting. We unexpectedly profited further by having in attendance two additional national workers—Mrs. Elizabeth O. Middleton, World's and national S. T. I. director, and Miss Theo Whiting, national field Americanization worker. With our beloved state president, Mrs. Nelle G. Burger, to preside, four national workers, our assistant state recording secretary and organizer, Mrs. Dorcas C. Ireland, six state superintendents, several county presidents and superintendents present, the personnel and leadership of the conference was of the superlative degree. Mrs. Burger's key-note address was full of zeal for the work and her admonition was "Be on the job."

Mrs. Elizabeth A. Perkins, national director of Child Welfare, presented the many phases of her line of work. She created new interest and appreciation for the department and furnished much valuable instruction and information. Her evening address on "Ideals of Democracy" was a master-piece on law enforcement. She gave courage and hope to Missouri comrades in their hard task.

Mrs. Laura P. Miller, national director, presented the "baby department," Women In Industry, in a most pleasing and forceful manner, creating deep interest in the department. Her very able manner in presenting the work, and her practical methods were much appreciated. She made some local surveys and secured information and statistics helpful to local workers. She is very thorough and thinks of every avenue whereby the department may be promoted. Her evening address on "The Frankenstein Monster of Industry" was scholarly, and her appeal to win the women in industry as W. C. T. U. members met with hearty response.

Missouri white ribboners extend to "Mother National" gratitude and appreciation for sending this team of workers.

Mrs. Elizabeth O. Middleton, national S. T. I. director, gave most concisely the many reasons why that work should be continued. Mrs. Rosa M. Webb, Missouri's S. T. I. superintendent, assisted by telling how. The hour's conference included a two-minute impromptu contest on the subject, "The benefits of S. T. I. training to our children." There were eight speakers. By ballot the audience awarded to Mrs. Dorcas C. Ireland, for the best speech, the pretty bow pin. This was a very profitable occasion. Mrs. Middleton is our own Kansas City comrade who is not without honor in her own country and whom we are always pleased to have with us.

Miss Theo Whiting, national Americanization field worker, in Missouri for a month, was invited to "sandwich in the Americanization plans throughout the conference," a feat she very ably accomplished! Her short, practical talks, workable plans and stirring appeals were most interesting. Mrs. Dorcas C. Ireland, the local director who is doing such fine work, and Mrs. Arda L. Davis, the former director, aided the work. The varied experiences of this group of workers in Americanizing our foreign sisters were most illuminating and very entertaining. Their remarks aroused an interest that will result in action. We thank "Mother National" for Miss Whiting.

Membership Plans

An interesting discussion on membership was led by Mrs. Burger. Every phase of the subject was considered. Trio teams, three hours' work, three days a week for three weeks, and various other ideas were brought forward. "Personal work" was the most popular method discussed. Mrs. W. H. Johnson, state worker, said, "Know no discouragement," Mrs. Dorcas Ireland, also a state worker, exhorted, "Go into the hard places." County and local presidents were equally optimistic. When Mrs. Burger called for definite pledges to be redeemed like a money pledge every able-bodied member in the audience arose. Mrs. Miller added to the helpfulness of these membership plans.

The part of woman in civic affairs proved an equally interesting subject. Experiences in getting women on the school board were related by county presidents. Our responsibility for the election of dry men to Congress was emphasized by the chairman. The law enforcement symposium was another interesting feature. The duty of local officers was most ably discussed by Mrs. H. J. Bone, who showed a knowledge of the situation. The duty of the press was set forth by Mrs. Taylor, also by Mrs. Burger in an able address. The duty of the church was well presented by Mrs. Ruth Womacks in a deeply spiritual talk. Mrs. Carrie J. Kaysing told of the very vital duty of the school in teaching reverence for law. Mrs. Perkins spoke on the subject, adding much to the discussion. Mrs. Ireland also handled the subject, from a state organizer's view-point.

The star-in-the-window campaign was well presented by Mrs. Burger and Missouri comrades urged to place the star in all homes standing for law enforcement.

Visit Police Commissioners

At the close of this conference, the institute, at the invitation of the police commissioners, went in a body to visit them and hear them tell how they are trying to enforce the Volstead Act. Chief Edwards greeted the ladies most graciously. Commissioners Foster and Wilson were tireless in answering questions and explaining their work. They had a large collection of pictures of places raided and stills destroyed. Chief Edwards cordially accepted the law observance card, presented by Mrs. Burger. The gave the assurance that they "were on the job to enforce the law."

Get Together Dinner

The one social occasion of the meeting was the dinner the closing night. Fine special music and greetings from the Councils of Clubs, missionary societies, schools, Ministerial Alliances, S. S. L. and W. C. T. U., with the parting addresses of Mrs. Perkins and Mrs. Miller, the response of Mrs. Burger and the "speeding" words from Mrs. Middleton and Miss Whiting made this a wonderful "feast of reason."

The devotionals of the meetings were conducted by the county and local presidents and were hours of deep spiritual refreshing. Mrs. Dorcas Ireland, Mrs. A. S. Carlton and Mrs. Arda L. Davis had charge of the music.

Co-Operation For Law Enforcement in California

Anna Marden De Yo, State Corresponding Secretary

Co-operation is the order of the day among the dry forces of California, and the W. C. T. U. is interpreting its own symbolical letters to signify, "We Come To Unite."

The Anti-Saloon League is launching a series of Law Enforcement conferences, expecting to hold one in every county of the state. Accepting the invitation to co-operate, the W. C. T. U. is sending a letter to all white ribboners in the county, urging them to be present and to wear their white ribbons.

The first one of these meetings was held in Salinas, Monterey county. The state president and the corresponding secretary of the W. C. T. U. were in attendance and the president, Mrs. Addie Garwood Estes, gave the challenge to the women, placing squarely before them their responsibility in our Enforcement Law campaign. Each precinct is to be organized, and the slogan will be "Win your precinct."

A second conference was held in Hollister, San Benito county. Here the corresponding secretary, Mrs. Anna Marden De Yo, represented the W. C. T. U. The evening speaker at both these conferences was Bishop Adna W. Leonard of the M. E. Church, who is giving one month out of his busy life to this campaign. When you hear him make the statement that there is not a minister in his area that he would not liberate from his pulpit to serve in this cause, you realize the emphasis he places on the necessity for winning our state enforcement law.

Many have heard the bishop's story of his childhood days in Ohio. His father suffered persecution, not only at the hands of the general public, but his own church, as well, when he dared to become the Prohibition party candidate for governor, but the bishop made the telling so impressive that one could fairly hear the crackle of the flames as he described the firing of their home at the hands of the rabble on the night of the election. Bishop Leonard paid a tribute to the worth and work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and told of his commission by Mother Thompson of Crusade memories, who after listening to his first sermon, whispered to him, "Adna, preach Jesus, and fight the saloon like the very devil."

"Reverence for Law" was the message of Lincoln given to the pupils of the schools of Yolo county, California, by the placing in the schools on Lincoln's birthday of the star-in-the-window law observance posters. The plan was evolved by the Woodland W. C. T. U. but the Woman's County and City Council, Mrs. H. J. Shute, president, and the Woodland League of Women Voters, Mrs. Lydia D. Lawhead, president, were responsible, through their executive boards, for the placing of the posters.

In this way 2,800 pupils have been reached and hundreds of homes, for to every schoolroom in the county a poster had been mailed and each pupil in the eighth grade and all above, had been given one. The stamp of approval had been placed upon the plan by the state superintendent of schools, Mr. Will C. Wood, who said, "I can see no objection whatever to the circulation in the public schools of these window cards. It is highly desirable that we shall call upon our young pupils to serve America and support the Constitution." Governor William D. Stephens, too, sent his thanks for the star-in-the-window poster sent him, and expressed hearty approval of spreading the message at this time. His use of the Lincoln quotation on "Reverence for Law" in his address has served to impress it upon both old and young.

So popular is the law observance star-in-the-window poster in Woodland that stores and offices are displaying it and the W. C. T. U. president writes, "We have a new slogan, 'Paint the town blue for Law Enforcement.'" Reverence for law will keep America safe.

It would be vastly more easy for the breweries and their lieutenants to put over the campaign for beer and wine, if they would wait long enough for the generation to die off which remembers the days when the breweries controlled the best business properties on Main street, and politics had its headquarters in the saloon.

SAFEGUARDING THE NATION is a splendid motion picture for teaching the effects of alcohol upon the human body and the loss of mental power and efficiency due to its use in small or large amounts.

It will give satisfaction as a basis of a school program in moving pictures because of its scientific accuracy and interesting concrete applications.

Preceded by a short address it makes a good Sunday evening entertainment for the church. The amoeba is a good example of the law of living by giving—when it ceases to give it ceases to live.

With a portable projector SAFEGUARDING THE NATION can be given to advantage before societies or in the home to small groups of thinking people as temperance propaganda.

The Enemy

Frances S. Hallowes

(The S. S. "Persia" is bound for India, having among its passengers Major Orde and Bertram Harford, who have become acquainted with a Mrs. Carlyle, her small son, Eric, and Angela O'Connor, who, in the charge of Mrs. Carlyle, is on her way to marry a Deputy Commissioner at Seraneb. Harford, who is a total abstainer, is glad to note that Angela refuses to drink, and the two become good friends. Consequently, Harford is much shocked to learn that Angela has been induced by Mrs. Carlyle to take some whisky for seasickness and has been overcome by the liquor. Through pity for her he breaks his reticence on the subject, and tells her that both his parents were victims of drink, and that he had promised his mother on her deathbed never to touch alcohol in any form. Angela admits that she has made her mother a similar promise, but does not mention any particular reason therefor. One night, while his mother is at a bridge party, tiny Eric helps himself to her whisky, left out on the table in their cabin, and quickly becomes unconscious. He is discovered and cared for, but dies during the night.)

CHAPTER V.

That dawn of day was one never to be forgotten by at least two passengers on board the "Persia." The great gates of the East opened slowly. A gorgeous rose dawn unfolded, and the vast, soft night fled before its radiance.

As the rosy light changed, a little procession passed to the side of the great ship. The doctor, a clergyman, two or three sailors, one carrying the little burden, and Harford and Angela. Bathed in the rising sun, Angela's white gown suffused with the pink glow, they stood while the solemn words of the burial service were quietly read; then came the handling of ropes.

Then a splash! Then—silence!

The ship forged ahead, leaving all that was mortal of little Eric Carlyle sinking beneath the green waves.

Angela shivered. Her lovely face was wan, her eyes red with weeping; a forlorn enough creature she looked in the early light.

"Miss O'Connor," said the doctor, "you not go back to No. 79. There is a deck cabin at your disposal. Your luggage shall be brought to you."

"Oh, but I cannot leave Mrs. Carlyle her grief."

"She is better alone. You can do good; leave her to me and the stewarde Again I ask you and Mr. Harford to silent as to the cause of death."

Harford threw up his head impatient "I don't recognize your right, doct to ask me to countenance an untruth.

"Oh, Mr. Harford, please, please c sent for my sake! She is my friend, I in her care, consider my feelings!"

Harford looked at her.

"I consent only for your sake," he said, gloomily.

"We shall be in Bombay in four da" said the doctor.

Angela started. "So soon? I had gotten!"

"You are worn out; go to bed d rest," said Harford.

Angela was seen no more on deck t day.

Gradually the news of the death of little Eric Carlyle was spread through the ship. The doctor's report of "d through misadventure" was accepted, but not without many questions as to the nature of the medicine. Nothing, however, of the truth transpired, though horrified whispers about the negligence of the mother were uttered.

FRECKLES!

March Brings Out Unsightly Spots. How to Remove Easily.

The woman with tender skin dreads March because it is likely to cover her face with ugly freckles. No matter how thick her veil, the sun and winds have a strong tendency to make her freckle.

Fortunately for her peace of mind, Othine—double strength, makes it possible for even those most susceptible to freckles to keep their skin clear and white. No matter how stubborn a case of freckles you have, the double strength Othine should remove them.

Get an ounce from your druggist and banish the freckles. Money back if it fails.

But for politicians who seek votes by appealing to old thirsts, and metropolitan newspapers similarly seeking sales, and men seeking to remonetize their old liquor business, the country would probably shortly forget it ever harbored a liquor question. —Lincoln (Neb.) Journal.

Farmer Bloc Is In Favor of Dry Law

Those versed in prohibition history know well that the first districts to go dry were the rural districts. No one class of people in the United States have been more influential in obtaining prohibition than the farmers. It is not surprising, therefore, that the farmer "bloc" stands for prohibition, as recently announced by Wayne B. Wheeler, general counsel for the Anti-Saloon League. Mr. Wheeler adds that "the 'farmer bloc' in the United States, like the 'farmer bloc' in the United States Senate, will fight for the welfare of the people."

Mrs. Carlyle did not appear. When Angela emerged from her cabin, she had a stricken look; as unlike as possible from the beautiful blooming girl who walked on the "Persia" thirteen days before.

She had spent two days in seclusion: they had been a time of much heart examination. When the doctor had spoken of their approaching arrival in Bombay, like lightning the thought of parting had darted through her heart. Harford was more to her than she dared to acknowledge to herself.

"He is so strong and reliable, a very Sir Galahad, too, with such a high ideal of life! He can say 'No' to temptation, and is not afraid of criticism, but I cannot bear to be singular," she whispered to herself.

When they next met he was passing her deck chair, and an appealing look of invitation brought him to her side.

He had given much thought to the possibility of getting her to promise to become an abstainer from all kinds of alcohol, and had come to the conclusion that it was his plain duty to warn her of temptations ahead.

They spoke of their arrival in Bombay, of her marriage, and journey up country; then Angelia said, "We part to-morrow, but I hope it may not be for long."

"Forgive me, Miss O'Connor, we must always be more than acquaintances, having gone through such a tragedy together. May I, on the strength of this, give you advice?"

"Most certainly," she said, pleased that he took such interest in her welfare.

"You will soon be in the position of a hostess in your own home. Will you remember that when you entertain, there may be some poor weak man or woman, whose love of alcohol may receive a new start at your table?"

"Do you mean I should not allow it there?"

"Yes; if your husband will consent."

"Well, I promise to ask him to banish it."

"Thanks, and you yourself. May I say something still more personal?"

"Oh, do! I promise you anything."

"You will have many temptations. You know something of the nature of alcohol. Can you resist it both as a luxury and as a medicine?"

"Yes! yes!" she shuddered. "Shall I ever forget Eric's death? It is written on my brain in letters of fire."

"But, forgive me, you must not think it will be an easy task to keep to your resolve. Strong drink is a great hypnotist; it deceives, blunts perceptions and renders people unable to judge aright of its action on themselves. You will have to do with people in India who imagine that alcohol is a necessity of life, that it strengthens and vitalizes. Will you learn all you can? Here is a book: in it is the evidence of the best medical experts—read it, and you will be fortified against temptation."

She took the book.

"Thank you; I shall never forget your goodness to me, Mr. Harford. May I ask a favor of you?"

"Certainly."

If I am ever in any trouble, may I send for you?"

Harford colored and hesitated.

"Your husband."

"Yes, I know he comes first," and she blushed, "but as a friend may I consult you?"

"I shall be glad to do any service for you."

She looked at him wistfully, thinking, in her innocence of the world, that he might have said more.

She sighed, and held out her hand. "This is our good-bye."

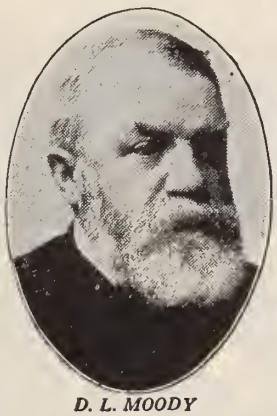
Study of the Bible
Gives Boldness and Success



D. L. MOODY

Said D. L. Moody: "When we find a man meditating on the words of God, that man is full of boldness and is successful."

Uneducated in early life, and always largely a man of one book—the Bible—he became not only well educated, but one of the world's great educators. Diligently, hungrily, prayerfully, systematically and obediently he studied the Bible, and God used him to bless the world as no man had been used for hundreds of years.

God is waiting to marvelously bless and use any man or woman who will wholeheartedly study HIS WORD.

Don't be deluded into thinking you haven't time for it! When we want with all our hearts to do a certain thing, we find time to do it. A little time every day, devoted patiently and persistently to systematic Bible study, under the direction of will enable you to reach the goal of a wondrously broadened and fruitful influence and power, which you can never attain apart from thoroughgoing study of the Bible.

"Real faith," said Mr. Moody, "is man's weakness leaning on God's strength." God will undertake for you if you will but give him the chance. Begin at once, continue faithfully to the end, and great shall be your reward. For courses covering the entire Bible we strongly advise that you take one of the following: SYNTHETIC BIBLE STUDY; SCOFIELD BIBLE CORRESPONDENCE COURSE; BIBLE DOCTRINE; BIBLE CHAPTER SUMMARY. Vol. XLVIII — EVANSTON, ILLINOIS, MARCH 16, 1922 — No. 11

O God of little children, whom thou on earth did'st love,
Look down today and bless them from heaven high above.
Our orchards and our vineyards we till with jealous care,
But child-plants, unprotected, are blooming everywhere.

O God of little children, teach us to know their worth.
Of such shall be thy kingdom in heaven and on earth,
And in the great world-garden thy labourers are we,
To guard and keep the blossoms for all eternity.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

SENATE ADAPTS COMMITTEES TO BUDGET SYSTEM—PRESIDENT FORBIDS SHIPMENT OF ARMS TO CHINA—CALIFORNIA INDIANS ASK PAY FOR LAND CEDED TO THE UNITED STATES—WOMEN POSTMASTERS LOSE NO RIGHTS BY MARRIAGE —WOMAN SUFFRAGE UPHELD BY SUPREME COURT

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

The tax on Congress grows greater with the days. The Washington Conference treaties, soldier bonus, ship subsidy, the tariff, appropriation bills and scores of other measures burden the legislators on Capitol Hill.

For many days the treaties will be paramount in the Senate and the bonus bill in the House. Appropriation bills are advanced more than usual at this date, due to the new budget system now in operation, but delay in the Army and Navy bills is expected.

Debate on the Four-Power Treaty has begun in earnest. Senators New of Indiana and Kellogg of Minnesota have spoken for ratification and Senator Lodge of Massachusetts and Underwood of Alabama, majority and minority leaders, have made strong appeals for ratification. Last week Senator Hitchcock of Nebraska spoke against the treaties in their present form. Senators Borah of Idaho, Johnson of California, and France of Maryland, have indicated their opposition.

Senate, by Amending Rules, Adapts Committees to Budget System

A change in Senate rules, adopted this week by a vote of 63 to 14, completes coordination of Congress with the Federal budget system by centralizing all the money appropriation powers in the Senate Appropriations Committee. Hereafter, the Army, Navy, Post Office, Agricultural and other appropriations will be considered by this committee. The Senate followed the action of the House after several days of controversy.

Senators Lodge, Underwood and Warren contended that the change was required to expedite supply bills and avoid confusion.

President Forbids Shipment of Arms to China

President Harding, by official proclamation this week, prohibited shipment of arms from the United States to China, in accordance with joint resolution of Congress, January 31, 1922, providing for such action by the President when he found "conditions of domestic violence" which might be promoted "by the use of arms or munitions of war procured from the United States."

Punishment for violation of the executive order is provided by the joint resolution as a "fine not exceeding $10,000," or "imprisonment not exceeding two years or both."

Calling attention to this, the President in his proclamation declared, "I do hereby warn them that all violations of such provisions will be rigorously prosecuted."

The President delegated to the Secretary of State the power of "prescribing exceptions and limitations" to the application of the joint resolution.

California Indians Ask Pay For 7,500,000 Acres Ceded to the United States Under Eighteen Treaties of 1851

There are eight Indian delegates in Washington who have come from California to persuade Congress to pass their Court of Claims bill, designed to enable them to bring their plea for a settlement by the government of their rights under unfulfilled treaties. The passage of this bill will enable them to come before the United States Court of Claims to seek payment for their claims.

The business settlement they are asking is of the eighteen treaties of 1851-52 by which they ceded all of California to the United States government, under the agreement that they were to have 7,500,000 acres reserved to them and receive about $1,800,000 worth of goods, cattle, implements, clothing and educational provision. They signed these treaties, the 400 chiefs and headmen of the 300 tribes and bands of California Indians, putting their thumb-marks and crosses on the "dotted line."

The Senate never ratified the treaties. The general feeling of Californians and of the delegation in Congress is one of sympathy with the appeal of the California Indians, and the general impression is that the passing of their Court of Claims bill by Congress and its adjudication by the United States Court of Claims not only would be justice to the Indians, but would go a long way toward making amends for failure to ratify the treaties.

The Indians do not seek a return of the lands they were promised, nor to disturb titles, although some of the greatest fortunes in California were won from their lands. What they ask is practical and modest, only that they be given a money compensation based on the valuation of the lands at the time the treaties were made. It is stipulated in their Court of Claims bill that they shall not receive more than $1.25 an acre—not an unreasonable sum considering the long wait and the sufferings of the Indians.

The Court of Claims bill was introduced in the House by Representative Raker of California and in the Senate by Senator Johnson of California—H. R. 4238 and S. 2235 respectively.

Women Postmasters Lose No Rights By Marriage

Former Postmaster General Hays before leaving office, by a ruling, reversed an unjust regulation which has been in effect for several years in deciding that a woman postal employe does not change her status, nor lose any rights in the service by marriage.

Heretofore, when an unmarried woman holding the position of postmaster married she was obliged to secure a new appointment, execute a new bond, or pass the required civil service examination in competition with other candidates seeking the office, if she had not previously taken such an examination. When the competition was keen, it has happened that the woman was below three of the other candidates and lost the office. Under the new ruling this cannot happen, as the woman postmaster will continue to hold the office without a reappointment, or another examination.

Similar controversies have arisen all over the country when women are employed in the public service, particularly in schools, where it has frequently been held that women who marry forfeit their positions as teachers. The ruling of Postmaster General Hays will set a precedent in the Federal service and will no doubt have an important effect in establishing for women the full rights of citizenship intended to be conferred by the Nineteenth Amendment to the Constitution.

The subject was referred to the Solicitor of the Post Office department who rendered opinion closing with the following words:

"Seeing no adequate legal reason why the marriage of postmasters, or of other women employes should, of itself, affect the tenure of office, and because of the fact that the requirement of reappointment and rebonding is very likely to result in injustice in a majority of cases, as well as cause useless multiplication of work in the department and because of the further fact that a regulation of this kind is objectionable because it is against public policy as being a restriction upon marriage, I have to advise you that in my opinion there is no legal requirement, other than the department's present regulations on the subject, for the reappointment and rebonding of women postmasters or of other women employes who marry during their terms of office, and that the Postmaster General has authority to revoke the regulations in question should he deem such course desirable."

Woman Suffrage Upheld by Supreme Court

The constitutionality of the woman suffrage or Nineteenth Amendment has been sustained by the United States Supreme Court in a unanimous decision rendered by Justice Brandeis.

The challenge came from the state of Maryland, where Oscar Leser and others sought to prevent the registration of two women as qualified voters in Baltimore.

Leser and his associates contended that the constitution of Maryland limited suffrage to men; that the legislature of Maryland had not become a part of the Federal Constitution. The Marlyand state courts sustained the amendment.

The contention that an amendment to Federal Constitution. The Maryland conditions to the electorate cannot be made without the consent of the state, the court disposed of by reference to the Fifteenth or equal suffrage Amendment, declaring that "one cannot be valid and the other invalid." It pointed out that the validity of the Fifteenth Amendment had been recognized for half a century.

The suggestion that several of the thirty-six states which ratified the Nineteenth Amendment had provisions in their state constitutions which prohibited the legislatures from ratifying, could not be entertained, the Court stated, because the state legislatures derived their power in such matters from the Federal Constitution, which "transcends any limitations sought to be imposed by the people of a state."

Had Power to Ratify

In regard to removing objections that the ratifying resolutions of Tennessee and West Virginia were inoperative, because adopted in violation of legislative procedure in these states, the Court asserted that these states had power to ratify and had officially notified the Secretary of State that they had done so, making their action binding upon the Secretary, and upon being certified by that official had become conclusive upon the courts.

First Woman to Sit in Upper House of British Parliament

The petition of Lady Rhondda for a seat in the House of Lords has been granted, and she will be the first woman to sit in the upper house of the British Parliament. Viscountess Rhondda is the daughter of the British wartime food controller, who died in 1918 from overwork, without leaving a male heir direct. She is a believer in equal rights, and during pre-war days, when English women were fighting for the ballot, she was a militant suffragist. A leading figure in the business world of Great Britain, she recently was listed as a member of the directorates of thirty-six companies. This decision of the committee on privileges of the House of Lords it is thought will affect all the peeresses in their own right in the United Kingdom. There are over twenty of these.

Reports From Alaska Show Co-operation in Law Enforcement

In his annual message, Governor Bone of Alaska gave a strong pronouncement on the question of prohibition law enforcement and further announced that he would ask the government to recall any Federal official who proved derelict in his duty. The governor has recently expressed his satisfaction with conditions in the territory and with the splendid co-operation being shown by the coast guard, although there is some difficulty in overcoming liquor smuggling across the Canadian border.

American Legion Employment Day

The American Legion is calling on the President to issue a proclamation setting aside March 20 as American Legion Employment Day. The purpose of the movement is to secure work for the 700,000 veterans that are out of jobs, many of them in distress. The Legion is asking organizations in sympathy with them to cooperate in making it a success. It suggests the following lines of community effort:

A survey of home conditions and a formulation of suggestions for remedy; focussing the attention of the entire community on the situation; mobilizing all available employment resources; utilizing all possible forms of emergency employment; co-ordinating all community organizations and influential individuals in accomplishing these things; advertising the fact that each community will care for its own, and that floaters and transients should get home if they expect consideration.

Workers of Germany and Austria Warned Against Alcohol

The Vienna, Austria, Arbeiter Zeitung, the organ of the Social Democrats, never loses an opportunity to urge the working classes to abstain from the use of strong drink. In addition to this a special organization, the Workmen's League of Abstinence, has for many years carried on in the ranks of labor a campaign against alcohol. However, while progress is being made, it is necessarily slow, as the middle classes and capitalist papers are strongly opposed to any anti-alcohol propaganda.

In Berlin, the Star Steamship Company, Berlin State Railways, Berlin Tramways, Berlin Overhead and Underground Railway and the Berlin Omnibus Company are all reported as insisting upon the strictest sobriety on the part of their employes, and drunkenness while on duty is regarded as a grave offense, punishable by dismissal.

In an interview granted on his seventy-fifth birthday the other week, Thomas A. Edison was asked his views in regard to light wines and beer. The great inventor frowned, reports the interviewer, and replied:

"Every man with brains ought to take a pledge to vote to make liquor impossible."

Bank Accounts Grow

Prohibition is having a wholesome effect on bank accounts. According to the New York Evening Mail, statistics giving the comparative savings bank deposits in twenty states for the years 1916 and 1921 indicate a tremendous growth in virtually every state in the year just closed.

Two New York Hospitals Report Decrease in Number of Drug Patients

At a meeting of members of the Narcotic Drug Control League, held on February 28 in New York City, five or six physicians were present who are specialists in the treatment of drug habits. Among these were Dr. Connolley of the Metropolitan Hospital and Dr. Jewett of Bellevue Hospital. Both of these doctors stated that there is a decrease in the number of drug addicts coming to these two large public hospitals for treatment. They said that the increase at Sing Sing prison is due to the fact that it is harder now for the criminal element in New York to get drugs and such people are willing to commit crime to get to Sing Sing and so obtain the drug they crave.

Dr. Connolley said that the addicts now coming to the hospitals for treatment are not new victims of the habit. No young boys and girls are coming but persons between the ages of twenty-five and thirty.

"The Path of a Hotel-Keeper is Not Strewn With Roses"

In March American Magazine

It was "a definite conviction that a hotel-keeper, in common with any other business man, ought to look for his profits in the thing he is selling, and not in a side line" that caused Tracy C. and John B. Drake, owners and proprietors of the Blackstone and the Drake hotels of Chicago, to plan the Blackstone hotel, with prohibition in mind. "They believed that the main job of a hotel keeper is to sell rooms, not booze, and they planned accordingly.

"Moreover they foresaw as far back as 1908 that prohibition was coming, and they prophesied that it would be a good thing for the hotel business if it did come. The prophecy has been fulfilled, financially, for them. The receipts of the Blackstone during the first year following prohibition were several hundred thousand dollars in excess of the previous year, and they believe that most hotel-keepers hold their heads up a little higher because they do not have to be saloon keepers."

Pan-American Conference of Women to Meet in Baltimore

A Pan-American Conference of Women is to be held in Baltimore, April 20-29, in connection with the third annual convention of the National League of Women Voters. Invitations have been sent out, through the State Department, asking the governments of the Latin-American republics to appoint delegates.

Parents and Teachers Taboo Drink and Cigarets

The board of managers of the Indiana Parent-Teacher Association in a recent meeting adopted a resolution pledging the association to support the enforcement of anti-liquor and anti-cigaret laws.

Swiss Temperance Forces Circulate Petition For Anti-Liquor Law

At Berne, Switzerland, the temperance forces have been very active in securing signatures to a petition for an anti-liquor law which would empower the cantons and communes to forbid the production of strong drinks within their boundaries. The bill, which is said to be signed by about 146,000 electors, is for the purpose of making it possible for one-tenth or more of the local electorate to demand a referendum on either the introduction or repeal of a local prohibition law.

Women In Politics

"What will be the attitude of the American woman in politics?" was recently asked of Hon. George R. Walker, former United States attorney in the Indian Territory under Roosevelt, and in Alaska under Taft. His reply was: "I have made this statement a hundred times to juries in the Federal courts:

"The lowlands of the Netherlands are dyked from the ocean by a black wall. The white hand of a child, on a historic occasion, covered a small hole in that wall. An hour later the opening would have become large enough to flood the Netherlands.

"Society has builded a black wall to hold back the oceans of evil from the lowlands of America. The proposed holes in the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act will be covered by the white hand in which is held the prayerful vote of the American woman. When the mothers of men learn their power they will create ways and means of conquering the evil. They who have been the consecrated creators of our country's progress and happiness have a keen appreciation of danger, and will work for the protection of the homes of the land."

New Jersey Ratifies the Eighteenth Amendment!

The forty-sixth state has ratified the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution! On March 6, by a vote of 12 to 4, the senate of New Jersey declared in favor of the measure and on March 9 the house adopted the senate's resolution. The signature of Governor Edwards is not necessary to make effective the action of the legislature. Efforts were made in 1920 and again in 1921 to secure ratification, but without success.

WOMEN'S PROHIBITION WORK IN SWEDEN

FORMER OFFICER OF NATIONAL W. C. T. U. OF SWEDEN MEMBER OF UPPER CHAMBER OF PARLIAMENT

A. Symonds Ohlin, Assistant National Secretary

After the great Woman's Prohibition Conference in Stockholm in 1921—attended by 2,000 women of whom nearly 1,200 were elected delegates—and which exceeded in size, attendance and triumphant enthusiasm anything ever known within the memory of the temperance party of Sweden, co-operative efforts in favor of prohibition have been carried on among the women all over the country. From the provinces farther south, up to the far North beyond the arctic circle, committees of women belonging to various temperance, religious and also social democratic societies, have been organized for the express purpose of keeping alight the fire lit by the conference in Stockholm, of educating and arousing the ignorant and the indifferent, and of taking every possible opportunity to promote the great cause of prohibition.

Special opportunities for prohibition work opened to us in connection with the general election of last September, when the women of Sweden, for the first time in the history of the land, went to the polls to cast their votes for parliament. Municipal enfranchisement has been theirs since 1862 but 1921 is the year of their full enfranchisement. Five women have been elected to parliament, one (formerly an officer of the National W. C. T. U. of Sweden) to the Upper Chamber, and four to the Lower Chamber. Of these four, two are total abstainers and prohibitionists, both are social democrats.

In Stockholm the temperance party put up its own candidates—all strong prohibitionists—and fought a valiant battle, but with no money and not overmuch experience, it is not to be wondered at that we did not succeed in gaining a single seat. But nevertheless we feel triumphant, for our maneuver split the liberal party and thus kept out of parliament our arch enemy, Dr. Ivan Bratt, the man who, under the pretense of serving the temperance cause, has introduced the restrictive system with its personal control, check books and permits, all with the object of defeating prohibition. The women did a splendid work and previous to election day held a most enthusiastic meeting. The National W. C. T. U. secretary, Miss Emilie Rathou, was put up as "No. 1" on the women's list and next to her came our principal traveling speaker, Miss Cecelia Francke. A special election paper with portraits and some biographical data concerning these two ladies was circulated by the thousands; we had also a women's motor driving about. Ladies stood all day outside the polling-halls handing out voting lists, thereby shocking most terribly their non-temperance acquaintances, who passed them with averted faces.

From June to early autumn, an intense propaganda was carried on everywhere in view of the coming election. Sunday, September 4, was a Women's Prohibition Day when great meetings and demonstrations were held all over the land by the newly organized women's committees. The September issue of Hvita Bandet—the W. C. T. U. official organ—was entirely given up to prohibition propaganda and the "run" was more than three times its usual size. Several excellent and stirring leaflets were especially printed and 270,000 copies distributed.

In several towns in various parts of the country the women have organized women's prohibition conferences on the pattern of the Stockholm Conference, and they have all, relatively to the size of the town, been equally successful and well attended.

A good omen in the fight for prohibition—which will be a stiff battle as time passes, for our opponents are strong and obstinate—is the fact that the Christian congregations are waking up to their responsibilities and opportunities as never before, but, on the other hand, we can note a sad drawback, due to the war—the indifference to high ideals of the rising generation. Many young people are far more pleasure-seeking and materialistic than a year ago, and this complaint, common to the belligerent countries, comes, also, from our neutral people.

The referendum has, by act of parliament, become part of our constitution, and a bill has been introduced demanding that in 1923 the referendum institution shall be put into practice and a plebescite taken as to prohibition. The enemy is artful and attempts are being made to take the votes of men and women separately, giving a lesser value to women's votes, saying that as women are mostly non-consumers of liquor they have no right to decide the question which argument proves the desperate fear that the women will make a clean sweep of the drink. It is expected the question will be debated in parliament about Easter, and we are preparing now to bombard our M. P.'s, a method we have learned from our American sisters. April will be an intensely interesting and important month.

W. C. T. U. of Jerusalem, Which Began its Seed Sowing Twenty-five Years Ago, Takes On New Life

The W. C. T. U. of Jerusalem, which was disbanded during the years of the war, was re-organized in August, 1921. The first meeting was held at the Friends Mission in Ram Allah, ten miles north of Jerusalem. Forty women were present, English, Americans and Syrians. Among these were missionaries from Egypt who had come to the hills for a little vacation. At this meeting it was reported that the money left with the treasurer, about five hundred dollars, had been spent during the war to help feed the hungry of Jerusalem. The relief was administered by Miss A. Elizabeth Brown, who is a charter member of the Jerusalem branch, which was organized about twenty-five years ago.

Regular meetings are now held monthly in Jerusalem at the home of Mrs. A. E. Thompson, the president. Literature, Prison, Peace, Evangelistic, Press and Legislation, are the departments carried on.

One public meeting has been held under the joint auspices of the International Order of Good Templars and the W. C. T. U. Two speakers, one of whom is a practicing physician and dealt with alcoholism from a medical standpoint, represented the men's society. The other spoke in Arabic, stating the object of the organization. Rosa E. Lee gave a short history of the origin and growth of the World's W. C. T. U. and followed this with a report of the existing liquor laws in Palestine and a resume of the present conditions. She reported that the Moslem villages are still free from the manufacture and sale of intoxicants, but in the cities and Christian villages the evil is on the increase. Jerusalem now has one hundred and fifty-one licensed drinking places, while practically all the groceries and many shops handle liquor in bottles without check or control.

Liquor Interests Show Fear Europe Will Go Dry

Press dispatches from Europe have told of the astounding progress the anti-alcohol movement has been making in Germany, and of the memorandum published by the Independent Socialist party in which the declaration was made that the prohibition of the use of alcohol in America has had very striking results and that official statistics on the subject are most definite in proving the benefits resulting therefrom.

Following this statement by the Socialists there appeared in the Freiheit an article by Dr. Drucker, saying that the prohibition movement had long since passed from America to Europe, and was daily winning greater support from the working classes. "More and more," he said, "are the people in Europe beginning to realize that bread and potatoes are necessary, but that alcoholic drink is not. Workers realize that through drinking, much energy, enterprise and intellectual power which might otherwise be placed at the disposal of their movement ar lost."

When one stops to consider that Ge many has always been looked upon l the liquor interests as one of their grea est strongholds, these declarations ha especial significance, and the wets, great alarm, are rapidly marshalling their available forces to counteract d propaganda. According to the Associat Press, minutes have just been publish telling of a recent secret convention Berlin of German and Swiss brewe At this gathering the brewers admitt they feared prohibition would sweep ov Europe, and a program was outlin which included a great press campai through German-speaking Europe. was decided to send a representative the brewers, Dr. Neumann, to the Uni States, to study the effects of proh tion here and to start the campa in the newspapers of Europe against p hibition of the use of alcohol and a prove its tonic advantages.

Dr. Neumann insisted that indirect sociation with the press and the inter ing of the press in all questions c nected with the brewery trade was solutely necessary. "All articles s to the press defending the liquor in rests must be written so as to pre the public from knowing they come f brewery interest sources," he asse and gave it as his conviction that if campaign was to be successful, it st be conducted astutely and with re ence to crowd psychology. The liquor articles sent to the press and advertisements must be "framed in

Child Welfare Studies

Conducted by E. A. P.

To Every Child Belongs the Right

- To be well born
- To be educated
- To be protected from child-labor
- To be morally safeguarded
- To be spiritually trained

The Iowa Child Welfare Research Station, while carrying on its intensive research work, yet answers many questions sent in by anxious mothers. These answers will help other mothers.

Harry L. is a fifteen-year-old high school boy who was admitted from the eighth grade conditioned in arithmetic. He takes but little interest in his school work and fails to make satisfactory grades. The parents question whether he should not be kept out of school and put to work on the farm.

Answer. Harry is probably a boy who develops slowly. He should, if possible, be kept in school, for if he is ever to have an education he must get it now. If he gives up too easily because THINGS ARE HARD, he will doubtless regret it when he is older and probably handicapped in some things he would like to do. Means should be found for arousing his interest and he should be challenged to exert his will power to overcome difficulties.

Mrs. S. is a young mother who has frequent disputes with relatives living in the home, over the training of a little ten-months-old child, the first in the family. The relatives think the child too young to be corrected and trained, the mother has a different opinion.

Answer. A ten-months-old baby's life is made up of habits good and bad. The first year of his life is the time to begin to train him in right ones. A good mother is constantly busy helping her child to overcome bad habits and tendencies, when they appear, and to substitute better ones. The time of feeding, the amount of food eaten, the time for naps, for being quietly alone, the time for romping, the time for fresh air and sunshine out of doors—all these make up the child's life. Waking up in the night to cry is a bad habit which should be checked, so also is the tendency to fret until taken up at inconvenient times of the day. Later on, learning to feed himself properly, to dress himself, and to pick up his playthings are good habits which should be developed.

Mrs. G. is a mother with a bright boy of normal physical development and good health. He gets his lessons so easily that the teacher cannot keep him busy in school. The mother hesitates to follow the advice of the school authorities and promote the boy to a higher grade. She fears that too rapid advancement may injure his physical health.

Answer. Probably more injury will be done to this boy by keeping him back than by allowing him to advance at a natural rate. If he were small for his age, one might hesitate to allow him to be promoted. As it is, he should have enough work to do to keep him in good habits of study

Mrs. K. has a nervous girl of five-and-one-half years. She is afraid of the dark, cries out frequently at night, bites her nails, and is tormented by fears of all kinds.

Answer. This child should live a regular, quiet life with plenty of good, wholesome food and fresh air. She should have plenty of play, but should never be allowed to get overfatigued. The mother should try to find out if anyone has frightened the child, and should teach the little one that the dark is soothing and restful, not full of terror. In a sympathetic way the mother should talk over the things which frighten the child. Find out the cause of her fears and rationalize them.

THE POLYGLOT PETITION FOR HOME PROTECTION

Anna Adams Gordon

We rightly term the Polyglot Petition, written by Frances E. Willard in 1884, the first clarion call to all the governments of the world for the prohibition of the liquor traffic and the opium trade. Frances E. Willard is the beloved founder of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union. In her quiet study in Rest Cottage, Evanston, Illinois, she wrote this petition while formulating the plans and the program for the World's W. C. T. U., organized in 1883. Miss Willard had just been reading a book on current reforms in which, with remarkable clearness and power, the evils of the opium trade were set forth. Her soul had recently been deeply stirred by scenes she had witnessed in old Chinatown in San Francisco. She felt that this petition would furnish a nucleus around which women of all lands might rally and would give to them the immediate work essential to the success of new and far distant auxiliaries. Her hope was abundantly realized for, as Miss Willard often said, in every part of Christendom the petition became a peg upon which have been hung paragraphs and presentation speeches, sermons and songs.

Signatures Secured From Fifty Nationalities

Signatures to this petition from fifty nationalities, and secured largely by W. C. T. U. world organizers, are mounted as compactly as possible on white muslin one-half yard in width, bound with red on one side and blue on the other—over one mile of canvas. If the names were written one under the other there would be more than five miles of actual signatures. Women are not alone in their appeal, through this petition, for there are many written endorsements of men. Counting the endorsements by resolutions or otherwise as attested by men and women officers of societies, this remarkable document has been signed by more than seven million people. "There are columns of Chinese women's signatures that look like houses that Jack built; lists of Burmese and Egyptian names that resemble bunches of tangled worms; hieroglyphics from spicy Ceylon that would make a shorthand man shudder. The incomprehensible Hawaiian chirography jostles the proud names of English ladies of high degree, and the charming senora of Madrid stands side by side with the 'her mark' of the converted woman of the Congo." Many noted names, like those of Henry W. Longfellow, John G. Whittier, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Neal Dow, Joseph Cook, Ira Sankey and a thousand that would be instantly recognized by the reader are with Miss Willard's name on the American petition. The English petition has a score or more of members of parliament and a list of other high dignitaries, indicating strenuous canvassing on the other side of the water.

The Protest of the World's Womanhood

The petition made its first public appearance in the United States at the first convention of the World's W. C. T. U. in 1891 in Tremont Temple, Boston; but its first presentation to a government took place in Washington, D. C., February 19, 1895. On February 15, it decorated "Convention Hall" packed with an audience of more than seven thousand people. In Miss Willard's public address, which she opened with the words: "Home protection is the keyword of woman's work," she stated that ten thousand groups of loyal-hearted mothers and wives, sisters and daughters, were united for the purpose of acting in an organized capacity as protectors of their homes, tempted youth and the little child. For this cause, she said, "there are bands of ribbon white around the world and this Polyglot Petition is but our prayer that 'tells out' a purpose of our hearts and heads wrought into a plea before the nations of the world. It is the protest of the world's wifehood and motherhood, its sisterhood and daughterhood—a protest 'in sorrow, not in anger.'"

"We expect," continued Miss Willard, "to present this petition to representatives of every civilized government. This cannot be done in the usual form, because when once received this Magna Charta of the home would become the property of a single government, and our plan requires that it be conveyed from one to another. We are also aware that in a legal and technical sense no government accepts the signatures of those outside its own boundaries. We have therefore preferred to make our petition a great popular testimonial against the enemies of the home, but we believe that its presentation will give an added impetus to progressive legislation against the liquor traffic, the opium trade, the gambling den, the house of shame. For while the last two are not specifically named, they are so closely interwoven with the traffic in alcohol and opium that the spirit of the petition necessarily includes them all."

Four days later, February 19, President Cleveland at the Executive Mansion received a delegation led by Miss Willard who handed to the President an attested copy of the great petition.

In 1895 the huge rolls of the petition were carried to London and were the central and significant feature of the World's W. C. T. U. Convention, held in Royal Albert Hall. A few weeks later Miss Willard presented the petition to the government of Great Britain. Her Majesty, Queen Victoria, graciously received two richly bound and illuminated volumes containing the text of the petition and the photographed signatures of thousands of her Majesty's subjects in Great Britain. The presentation of these elegant volumes was made possible through the generous kindness of Lady Henry Somerset.

At the fourth convention of the World's W. C. T. U., in 1897, the big petition adorned Massey Music Hall, Toronto Canada. A few months later Mrs. Lillian M. N. Stevens carried out Miss Willard's earnest desire to have the petition presented to the Canadian Government and was her able representative at a great meeting in Ottawa, presided over by Sir Wilfred Laurier, who received the petition on behalf of the Dominion Government.

Polyglot Petition Must Continue to Help the World

This petition must continue to help make the world wider for women and happier for humanity. We must present it to other governments and secure additional signatures. We rejoice that members of the Young People's Branch will undertake its circulation for further signatures and endorsements of men and women.

The Polyglot Petition already has wrought great good in the whole round earth by causing an arrest of thought among uncounted millions of well-disposed men and women. Its earnest plea for the abolition of the liquor traffic, the opium trade and the traffic in the purity of the mother sex has penetrated the thought, affections and purposes of a larger number of human beings scattered over a wider area than ever has been affected by any single effort heretofore put forth by women.

We all believe that one of the choicest fruits of Christianity will be the growth of a bond of brotherhood and sisterhood so close among all nations, races and peoples, that we shall become truly kindred each to the other, and that great word Humanity, like a rolling wave of the ocean of God's love, shall wash out from the sands of time the words caste, creed, and even that good word patriotism, because we shall feel that the whole world is our country and all men are our kin. Every utterance of appreciation, affection and friendship; every token of mutual co-operation; every stroke of honest hard work undertaken side by side; every sincere prayer, helps forward this beautiful day that we call the coming of the Kingdom of Christ.

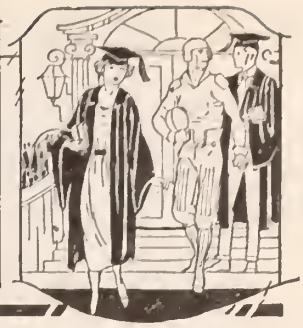
OUR YOUNG PEOPLE



TO THE YOUNG PEOPLE HAS COME THE HONOR OF SECURING SIGNATURES TO THE POLYGLOT PETITION

Mrs. Maude B. Perkins, National Y. P. B. Secretary

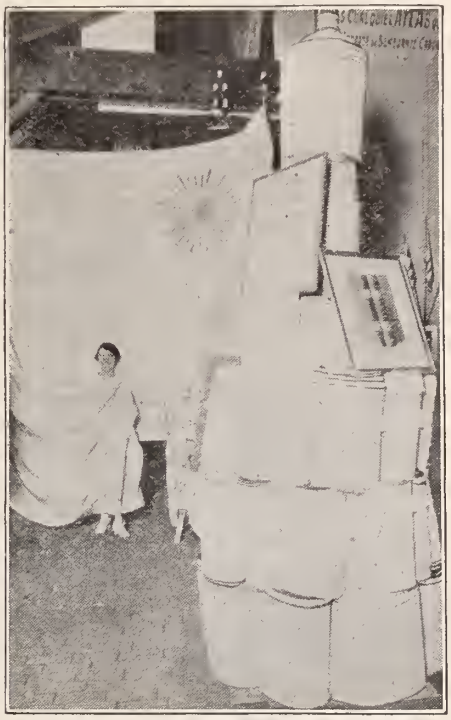
The National W. C. T. U. has designated April as our special Y. P. B. month, and April 14 as our special Y. P. B. Day. Its confidence in the ability of the young people to do great things has been shown by the definite task committed to our care, that of securing signatures to the famous Polyglot Petition. Our goal is 500,000 names.

A history of the famous document, the result of the inspired thought of America's uncrowned queen, Frances E. Willard, has been sent to every state Y. P. B. secretary, together with petition forms and some suggestions as to ways and means of securing signatures.

Part of the purpose of the Young People's Branch is to perpetuate the blessed heritage that has come to us from the "mother organization." Prohibition is this legacy. That we may show our appreciation of it, and help secure for other nations of the world freedom from the liquor traffic, let us of America enthusiastically secure signatures to the Polyglot Petition. Because we have prohibition and know its benefits, we are the ones to do this.

May I tell you one ambition of mine, dear young people? It is that we may have all these signatures ready to present to the officers of the World's W. C. T. U. when the convention meets in Philadelphia next November. Not all our young people will be privileged to attend this great meeting but they may lend their influence to it by co-operation in this plan.

If you have not received the story of this petition, send five cents in stamps for it to National W. C. T. U. Headquarters, Evanston, Illinois. Study it. Give much publicity to this work of ours. Take the petitions to meetings of missionary societies, fraternal organizations, to the Sunday schools and young people's societies, to churches and colleges, explain its purpose, present the claims of your Young People's Branch and secure signatures. Select prominent business centers and leave petitions there for busy people to sign.



The Polyglot Petition

Special Meetings

There are many young women, members of the W. C. T. U., who can help in this work. A special meeting for young people, held April 14, by every local W. C. T. U. in America, for the purpose of presenting the petition work, as well as the general aims of the Y. P. B., may result in many new Branches.

500,000 signers to the Polyglot Petition will be additional proof of the confidence of American young manhood and womanhood in prohibition and a testimony of their desire to have its blessings extend "all round the world."

Definite plans bring definite results and we ask the co-operation of local Y. P. B. secretaries with state Y. P. B. secretaries, and also of the state presidents of the W. C. T. U. in interesting more young people in our work. This is a specific task, and if we all work together, we shall be able to roll up a mighty petition. While we go about our task let us remember that we are creating sentiment for the enforcement of prohibition at home and that it will bring cheer to the hearts of our workers everywhere to know that the splendid Y. P. B.'s in America are seeking to bring in the glad day of World Prohibition. God bless you in your efforts.

THE POLYGLOT PETITION

For Home Protection

Written by Frances E. Willard

To the Governments of the World (Collectively and Severally). Honored Rulers, Representatives and Brothers:

We, your petitioners, although belonging to the physically weaker sex, are strong of heart to love our homes, our native land, and the world's family of nations. We know that clear brains and pure hearts make honest lives and happy homes, and that by these the nations prosper and the time is brought nearer when the world shall be at peace. We know that indulgence in Alcohol and Opium, and in other vices which disgrace our social life, makes misery for all the world, and most of all for us and for our children. We know that stimulants and opiates are sold under legal guarantees which make the governments partners in the traffic by accepting as revenue a portion of the profits, and we know with shame that they are often forced by treaty upon populations either ignorant or unwilling. We know that the law might do much now left undone to raise the moral tone of society and render vice difficult. We have no power to prevent these great iniquities, beneath which the whole world groans, but you have power to redeem the honor of the nations from an indefensible complicity. We, therefore, come to you with the united voices of representative women of every land, beseeching you to raise the standard of the law to that of Christian morals, to strip away the safeguards and sanctions of the State from the drink traffic and the opium trade, and to protect our homes by the total prohibition of these curses of civilization throughout all the territory over which your Government extends.

Three Trumpet Notes of Victory

Mrs. Frances P. Parks, National W. C. T. U. corresponding secretary, is making a tour of the South, speaking at the one-city-in-a-state conferences in West Virginia, Tennessee, Alabama, Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina and Virginia. She is sounding three trumpet notes of victory in her appeal for a Million Members:

"I wish—I can—I will!

"We all wish for a larger membership. We can find women all about us who ought to share with us the blessing of 'belonging.' Will each do her best to get THREE NEW MEMBERS during the campaign for a Million Members? Will you pledge every member in your union to give three hours to the pleasant task of winning members?"

Mrs. Livingston Sails For South Africa

Mrs. Deborah Knox Livingston, national W. C. T. U. director of the Christian Citizenship department, sailed Saturday, March 11, on the Steamship "Cameronia" of the Cunard line, from New York, for South Africa. Mrs. Livingston goes on invitation of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of South Africa to help in its campaign for local option as the first step toward the securing of national prohibition.

Revival of Polyglot Petition

The Y. P. B.'s of the United States are to make the securing of signatures to the Polyglot Petition one of their big objectives. They want to roll up 500,000 signatures before the World's W. C. T. U. Convention, next November. Every member of the mother organization will be interested to help. Watch the Young People's page from week to week for news of their plans.

Great Impression Made By Tour of Madame Yajima

A missionary friend writes from Japan: "Whatever may have been the effect abroad of Madam Yajima's tour of America, there is no doubt that the effect in Japan is excellent upon the W. C. T. U. itself, upon all Christian bodies, and upon the general public. Even her collapse after her return has served to deepen the impression. I believe that the strength of spiritual forces in moral reforms is being recognized as never before."

Ideals and Law Enforcement

An exchange tells the story of a teacher who gave his class the task of an impromptu one-minute speech from a list of topics he had placed upon the blackboard. One of these was, "My Ideal Man," the teacher having in mind some noted character. He was surprised, therefore, when a fourteen-year-old boy rose and said something like this:

"My ideal man is our teacher. He comes here every day and teaches us lots of things. He can draw on the blackboard, and he always has a dime to lend a fellow when he meets him on the street. He takes us on camping-trips, and plays baseball with us, and acts just like us. He's smart, too, and can speak on anything at all, and can recite poetry."

The influence this teacher wielded over the lad is not to be questioned. Whatever he told the boy would assume great importance. This period of "hero worship" in the child's life demands that instructors shall be of the highest moral character.

Can we not make use of this idealism in teaching the value of law observance to the more than twenty-three and one-half million children who are in the public schools of our country this year? If instructors themselves disregard in the slightest degree any of the regulations of the school, or of the community in which they live, children perhaps will admire them for their "daring," but, alas, their attitude will have its reflex not simply in the way the young people look upon a particular violation, but their whole outlook upon life may be altered. While the teacher may have entirely forgotten the small (?) matter, the pupil who thought most of him and looked up to him with whole-souled admiration, may conceive a life-long disregard for all law.

Why not ask the principals of the schools in your city to take up, in the teachers' meeting, this subject of reverence for law, suggesting the value of influence—that the pupils will be quick to carry out the wishes of the teachers whom they like—and showing the way in which law observance underlies most of our civilization.

Some most interesting school debates might be given on such topics as: "Resolved that in the evolution of government we gradually have limited the sphere of personal liberty," or Daniel Webster's statement, "Liberty exists in proportion to wholesome restraint." A basis for a most interesting discussion for class or school would be found in the cycle theory of civilization, which is, in the words of Attorney General Daugherty, "that nations develop a strong, virile life of simple living in their infancy, pass through the various steps of development, and then break more and more the restraints of life, until, surfeited with the luxury that a high civilization can give, they throw off, little by little the restraints of life, until simple living has been changed to license and an unbridled indulgence in everything that appetite and propensities call forth. This effeminates, enervates, and undermines the virility of the nation so that it becomes enfeebled, falling sometimes at the hands of a younger and more virile civilization; sometimes by decay, merely by mental or moral or spiritual atrophy. Then, after the wake of centuries, starting over again, they repeat the same processes."

The lesson, interpreted, is that "if our civilization will place such restraints about itself as to keep it strong and virile, its civilization will endure. If it yields to false doctrines of personal liberty, it will go the way of the nations of the past." The illustrations to point this truth may be found so easily that students that the opportunity of a discussion should not be missed.

Let us enlist the influence of the teachers for the instruction of our children in reverence for law.

Our Cover Page

For the illustrations on our cover page this week, which so charmingly picture child-life in many lands, we are indebted to the courtesy of The Survey. The artist is Anna Milo Upjohn, and the children represent, respectively, the United States, Italy, Great Britain, France, Czecho-Slovakia, China, Jugo-Slavia, Spain, Belgium, Poland, Holland, Albania, Roumania, Greece, and Montenegro. As we look at these little ones from many countries, we are constrained to realize anew that work with the children is of the most value, not only because "of such is the kingdom," but for the reason of their hidden potentialities. We cannot too often recall to mind the words of the great thinker who, when asked why he bestowed so much time and attention upon the children, said, "When we save an adult, we save one person; when we save a child, we save untold numbers."

"Stickers"

In the dim, far-off beginnings, primitive man scratched crude pictures of bears or wolves on the walls of his cave to commemorate a victory over these foes of the forest. The ancient Egyptian, earliest of civilized men, recorded on the walls of his temples in the graphic "picture writing" we know as hieroglyphics, long centuries of his doings. The modern advertising agent, apostle of "applied psychology," when he is given free rein, always uses a picture to drive home his message, knowing full well that by no other means can he make so quick, so vivid, so lasting an impression on the mind of his constituency—the public.

The promoters of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union Convention have already begun to make good use of this most efficient tool of the professional advertiser. They are now scattering broadcast a most artistic little "sticker" which sticks most tenaciously to letter, package or suitcase, whenever applied. It also sticks quite as firmly in the minds of all who see it, working its way into homes which would often be barred against any temperance literature, informing and reminding their occupants that Pennsylvania is to be hostess for the White Ribboners of the World in November next.

Among the many ways in which these little messengers can be used in sending them abroad on their mission of publicity are:

On letters, post-cards, suitcases, packages, school children's note-books, backs of checks, backs of tickets, magazines before giving them away, out-going bills and receipts. They can be used to fasten parcels. Invite tradesmen to put them on their goods; if they will not pay for them—let the union give them to any who are willing to co-operate in this way.

We were able to get a very special price on them and are therefore able to offer them at a most reasonable figure considering that they are most artistic. The price:

$3.00 per thousand; 50 cents per hundred.

Please send remittance with order to: Mrs. James B. Scott, 503 South 46th Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awakening continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

The Touch of Human Hands

Among the hills of Galilee,
Through crowded city ways,
The Christ of God went forth to heal
And bless in olden days.
The sinning and the sad of heart
In anxious throngs were massed
To catch the great Physician's eye
And touch him as he passed.
We have not in our hours of need
His seamless garments pressed,
Nor felt his tender human hand
On us in blessing rest;

Yet still in crowded city streets
The Christ goes forth again,
Whenever touch of human hand
Bespeaks good will to men.
Whenever man his brother man
Upholds in helpfulness;
Whenever strong and tender clasp
A lonely heart doth bless,
The Christ of God is answering
A stricken world's demands
And leading back a wandering race
By touch of human hands.

"A White Star in the Window Is Better Than a Purple Wreath on the Door"

The use of a white star, in homes and places of business, to signify obedience to the letter and spirit of prohibition, is urged by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and it is a good thing.

The movement is likely to grow. The majority almost everywhere are strongly in favor of prohibition, otherwise it would never have been adopted and never sustained. Acquiescence at present is doubtless more general than scoffers would have the public believe. A recent estimate shrinks the 20,000,000 American drinkers of pre-prohibition times to a mere couple of millions. And the number is now steadily diminishing, largely because of the fear aroused by the wave of illness and death spread by poisonous bootleg liquor and home brew.

A WHITE STAR IN THE WINDOW IS CERTAINLY BETTER THAN A PURPLE WREATH ON THE DOOR.

RED LETTER DAYS

March 20—Prohibition Rally Day (Birthday of General Neal Dow.)
April 14—Young People's Branch Day (Birthday of Frances J. Barnes.)

Quarterly Temperance Sunday In the Sunday Schools

The Sunday School department of the National W. C. T. U., with the co-operation of the Temperance department of the International Sunday School Association, established the Anti-Cigaret Day in the Sunday Schools. The date is fixed by the appearance of the second quarterly temperance lesson of the year in the International Uniform Sunday School Lesson Series.

The date for 1922 is April 23. The quarterly temperance lesson, found in 2 Chron. 26: 1-21, is adaptable to the needs of Anti-Cigaret Sunday. Temperance topics for classes in all divisions of the Sunday School are suggested in our lesson leaflet, now a two page leaflet costing 20 cents per 100. The leaflet gives also a chart for a chalk talk. The reduction in size and price of this leaflet was made to enable workers to give the leaflet a wider circulation among Sunday School teachers. The general temperance topic for the Sunday School program on Anti-Cigaret Day is "Destructive Habits which leave their Marks Upon Human Life." The suggestive program, issued by the department, gives an outline for a talk on this subject. The blackboard exercise, "Three Enemies," provides a striking picture, easily drawn, and an anti-cigaret talk. Pupils from the children's division may bring to the main school, songs or recitations. Encourage anti-cigaret story-telling. Make selections from the Gem Leaflets of the Sunday school department series. The following are good: "The Price He Paid," "Tested By the Hike," "A Good Reason," "The Boys and the Flag," "General Richard." "A Little Child Shall Lead Them" may literally be fulfilled if we work through the Home department of the Sunday school, enlisting this department in a systematic distribution of anti-cigaret literature by the children in the homes. For this work use the following from the envelope leaflets of the Sunday School department series: "Watch," "Share," "Telegrams," "Luther Burbank on Alcohol and Tobacco," "Quaker Philosophy," "The Sword and Shield."

There are eight practical reasons for anti-cigaret work in the Sunday school and valuable suggestions for the work found in the departmental method leaflet, "The Sunday School and Anti-Tobacco Work."

The general public should know more about our Sunday school temperance work and we urge publicity. Let the local press and the church bulletins announce Anti-Cigaret Sunday and report in the papers on Monday the special programs given by the schools. Pastors will give heed to your requests for brief mention of the day and the evils of the cigaret.

The Anti-Cigaret Sunday School rally has become an annual occasion in many places. A contest rally is one in which the various schools compete for a prize which is given to the school furnishing the best program feature for the occasion, judges being appointed to render the verdict. If this plan is not followed, we urge the use of the program, "The Doom of Prince Nicotine," which calls into action several speakers (who may be selected from the different schools) and furnishes a most significant lesson. Sample program 2 cents, Exercise, 2 cents.

One hundred thousand members of the Sunday School Anti-Tobacco Legion of the United States is the goal of this department. Any member of the Sunday school who signs the anti-cigaret or anti-tobacco pledge thereby becomes a member of the Anti-Tobacco Legion which is only the name given to the Sunday school pledge signers. Girls, as well as boys, should be asked to sign the pledge against cigarets and tobacco.

Again we announce that the personal literature of Mrs. Stella B. Irvine, which contained much anti-cigaret material, has been presented to the National W. C. T. U. for the Sunday School department and is listed with the department literature in the new catalogue. PLEASE NOTICE! Send all orders to the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, Evanston, Illinois. The national superintendent is creating a mailing list of workers who pay the small fee of fifty cents to help cover postage, and will send to them free samples of all literature of the department as it is provided for the various lines of Sunday school work, also the new department bulletin and various and frequent letters of instruction, to the end that the work and workers may be developed. All white ribboners interested in the Sunday School department should enroll and belong to this "inner circle" of the Sunday School department of the National W. C. T. U.

Yours in Loyal Service,
STELLA B. IRVINE,
National Superintendent.

Announcement

POSTER CONTEST OF THE SUNDAY SCHOOL DEPARTMENT

The national superintendent of the Sunday School department offers ten dollars to the maker of the best original Anti-cigaret poster. Pupils of the children's division (including the primary and junior departments of the Sunday School) are eligible to compete.

A prize of ten dollars is also offered to the pupil of the young people's division (including the intermediate and senior departments) who makes the best original poster showing the evils of the alcohol and tobacco habit.

All posters should be sent direct to the national superintendent, Mrs. Stella B. Irvine, 115 Walnut Street, Riverside, California, not later than September 30, 1922. These will form a part of the department exhibit at the coming national convention and posters will be judged by a committee of national officials.

Five dollars will be given to the state superintendent who most effectively promotes this Sunday School poster contest.

Stella B. Irvine, National Superintendent.

We record here the names of friends and comrades who have recently passed to the higher life:

MRS. EDITH McNAUGHTON of Ray, Indiana, a devoted temperance worker who will be sadly missed by her white ribbon comrades, for the keynote of her life was service to the cause.

MRS. SARAH BAKER of Las Cruces, New Mexico. Although an active church worker and member of a woman's club, her special allegiance was given to the W. C. T. U. Her loss will be keenly felt in church and temperance circles and by a host of friends.

MRS. HELEN DICKENS of Hudson Falls, N. Y., for twenty-five years a member of the local union. She will be greatly missed by her white ribbon comrades.

MRS. NELLIE BLESSING EYSTER of San Francisco, Calif., first president of the San Jose union, and state recording secretary from 1885 to 1887; founder of the San Francisco League of American Pen Women, and prominent as a writer. Mrs. Eyster represented the state W. C. T. U. at the World's Congress of Women held in Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1900. In the W. C. T. U. convention of 1883, she was the first woman to speak on the then tabooed subject of woman suffrage, and so tactfully did she present it that she completely won her audience. Her lectures in the public schools on scientific temperance were perhaps her greatest achievement. A woman of large sympathies, great magnetism and charm of manner, Mrs. Eyster was a welcome figure in all circles.

WHAT IS THE REAL NEWS ABOUT PROHIBITION?

GET INTO YOUR LOCAL PAPERS THE FOLLOWING STATEMENTS AS TO THE BENEFITS OF PROHIBITION

Jail and Penitentiary Records Show Decrease in Crime

The Washington (D. C.) Post, which has been making a survey of the general situation under prohibition, in its issue of January 8, 1922, gives the following summary:

"In one respect nearly all the reports received agree in substance. A marked decrease in crime has been noted the country over during the period since the national prohibition law went into effect. It is true that the last few months have seen greater activity on the part of criminals, and numerous instances of spectacular lawlessness. Where this has been noted it has been explained as due to the economic situation, unemployment and the after-the-war breakdown of morals. In spite of it the jails and penitentiary records show that crime has decreased in the two years materially. Hospitals and other records show, too, that insanity has decreased."

First of Her Children to be Born Above Ground

Dr. Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard University, speaking before the Twentieth Century Club, of Boston, October 29, 1921, said: "There are three classes whose testimony I find most valuable—district nurses, school nurses and social workers of all kinds. All these give testimony to the good effects of prohibition legislation on families, chiefly families of the working men. A district nurse called on a woman who was expecting confinement. She said to her visitor: 'I have four children already. This one that is coming will be the first born above ground.' The nurse did not quite comprehend, but the woman went on: 'The only way I was able to get money was to take it out of my husband's pocket when he was helplessly drunk. I took what was necessary, but I never could get enough to hire any room that was not a cellar. All my four children were born underground. This one is going to be born above ground.'"

Cheyenne Lauds Dry Law

The commissioners of the city of Cheyenne, Wyoming, through a resolution adopted in regular session February 6, 1922, and sent to their Senators and Congressmen at Washington, protested against the action of the city council of Chicago regarding the legalization of the manufacture and sale of beer and wine for beverage purposes, and said:

"We believe that no law has a more beneficial effect upon the city of Cheyenne than the law prohibiting the beverage liquor traffic; to substantiate this belief we call your attention to the following tabulation of the records of the office of the chief of police for the year 1917, the last complete year under the liquor license system, and the year 1921:

	1917	1921
Arrests for drunkenness	907	150
Arrests for disorderly conduct	849	211
Violations of liquor laws	64	36
"Domestic crimes" (wife beating)	5	1
Arrests in aggregate	3072	1341

Dry Law Good for the Children

The latest annual report of the state board of charities of New York, says there has been an appreciable decrease in commitments of children to orphan asylums, one superintendent reporting that he knows of no cases within the last year committed wholly because of intemperance of parents.

County Jail Population Decreases

At the close of its fiscal year. September 30, 1921, the Indiana state board of charities stated that more than two-thirds of the county jails of the state were empty. "This decrease in county jail population in the last three years, or since the state-wide prohibition law went into effect," asserts the pamphlet, "is the most interesting fact to be noted in connection with public institution statistics."

Good Will Industries Show Improved Conditions

The superintendent of the Goodwill Industries of St. Paul, Minnesota, A. F. Carlyle, writes that "the missions and churches connected with the Goodwill Industries in twenty-one cities have all noticed a decided falling off in the attendance of the drunkards. In the city of Boston, Mass., it was no uncommon thing before prohibition to take care of fifteen to twenty intoxicated men a day; now the average does not exceed two a week and some weeks none at all. In my own city of St. Paul, we have had in our mission and through our employment agency only about five cases of drunkenness in the last two months."

Now the Men Have Savings Accounts

Ex-Congressman Charles E. Randall recently traveled across the country by automobile, stopping in all sorts of towns, hamlets and cities. In South Amherst, Ohio, he stayed overnight with a family, the head of which was a foreigner and a laborer in the Amherst stone quarries. Asked about the effects of prohibition, this man replied, "I never voted for prohibition and never will on my own account. But let me tell you what happened to my neighbors. I can take you into twenty homes where the men all work in quarries. Before prohibition not a single one of these families had sufficient food or were properly clothed. Today every one of them has a savings account and they wear good clothes; and the women and children are happy, as they were not before."

WORLD'S W. C. T. U. NOTES

Flora E. Strout sends the news that the W. C. T. U. of Ceylon is to have a temperance exhibit at the All-Ceylon Industries Exhibition, which is to be opened by His Royal Highness, the Prince of Wales.

Word has been received of the homegoing of Miss Abiertas, the gifted president of the W. C. T. U. of Manila, the Philippine Islands. Miss Abiertas was a young Filipino lawyer, of strong convictions, which she fearlessly expressed. Through her influence she had brought into the union other women of ability, and was building up the work in splendid fashion. She will be sorely missed. Dr. Higdon of the Christian Mission Church (of which Miss Abiertas was a member), and the W. C. T. U. conducted the funeral service.

Frances Willard Wang writes that the China W. C. T. U. is making plans to double its membership from 5,000 to 10,000 during the coming year, if possible.

Miss J. Franklin, President of the Central Provinces W. C. T. U., has prepared a tract in Hindi on "How Prohibition was brought about in America."

Miss Franklin saw the growth of the temperance movement in America from its infancy as her mother was one of the Crusaders. She went to India in 1893 as a missionary, but when home on a furlough during 1907-8 travelled extensively over the country.

In a recent letter received from Mme. Gabrielle Julien Koechlin, president of the W. C. T. U. of France, she tells of a plan to reorganize the work among the young mothers. It is thought that the white ribboners can advise and aid them in protecting their children from the evil of strong drink. They are to be asked to take the total abstinence pledge and enroll their little ones in the "Hope of the Cradle" league, with a promise that they will give no alcoholic drinks to their children up to seven years of age. A study symbolizing the normal and joyous life for the child is in preparation, and with this in view a Flower Mission department has been organized to bring light and joy into darkened homes.

Work For Children Stressed In Oregon Meeting

Mrs. Hattie M. Wolfe, Benton County Press Superintendent

The first regional conference of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union to be held in Oregon, met in Corvallis, February 16, 1922.

Among those present were the state president, Mrs. Mary Mallett; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Madge Mears; superintendent of Child Welfare, Mrs. Lottie Hannon, of Social Welfare, Mrs. May Booth, and Mrs. Ada Wallace Unruh, manager of the campaign for funds for the Children's Farm Home. Representatives from eight counties were also in attendance. This means much, as the counties of Oregon, as a rule, are no small affairs.

Mrs. Mallett and Mrs. Mears conducted a study of departments, which was intensely interesting, and brought forth discussion from the floor.

The membership campaign for this year was presented by Mrs. Mears. A splendid arraignment of the insidious suggestions which appear in many of the best magazines through otherwise good stories, was made by Mrs. Mina Hall Epley, president of Benton county, hostess of the conference. This resulted in a resolution that women should write letters of protest to editors of such publications, asking that references to the use of narcotics, and loose talk regarding the marriage relation and law enforcement be omitted. Many persons feel that a general demand for stories free from evil would result in a supply. Editors print what they think their readers want.

While Oregon women are interested in all phases of W. C. T. U. work, the center of attraction at this time is the Children's Farm Home project. A farm three and one-half miles from Corvallis has been selected, and payment made on a tract of land containing 245 acres, with substantial improvements. The soil has been passed upon by experts of the Oregon Agricultural College, and the general plan has been approved by the child welfare commission of the state. As all roads lead to Rome, so all topics discussed led to the Farm Home.

Mrs. Ada Wallace Unruh, who is now manager of the campaign for the raising of funds, gave a valuable address, making plain the needs for a home for Protestant homeless or dependent children. She also outlined methods of raising funds and other means of support. Mr. Paul Maris, of the O. A. C. faculty, in a splendid address outlined many of the ways by which the college could be (and would be) of use in maintaining the Home. The state W. C. T. U. is fortunate in having on its campaign committee, and as trustees, board of directors, and other officials, the governor of the state, president of the Oregon Agricultural College, president of the State University, members of the board of regents, lawyers, editors, business men, city officials, women of note in clubs and the state W. C. T. U. and many other influential citizens.

The women of Benton county furnished the dinner and supper at the place of meeting. This was fortunate, as Jupiter Pluvius did his best that day, particularly at the noon hour, at which time the Commercial Club of Corvallis sent autos to the church to convey to the Farm Home site all who wished to go. And they do say it rained during the trip out and back. The women appreciate this courtesy extended to them by the Commercial Club.

Maine Meeting Enthuses and Inspires

Alice M. Bigney, State Corresponding Secretary

Maine's one-city-to-a-state institute, at Waterville, was notably successful. The attendance exceeded the most sanguine anticipations, every county, with one exception, being represented. To those who have knowledge of traveling conditions in Maine at this season of the year, the facts named speak eloquently of the deep interest manifested. The presence of nearly the entire state official board, of three national directors and many superintendents, state, county and local, insured its success.

President Althea G. Quimby's address was an inspiration, as are all her utterances. The leading topics—the membership campaign and law enforcement — were carefully considered, definite plans formulated and many helpful suggestions advanced. The trio team was especially stressed. Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger, in addition to her splendid presentation of her own department activities, was most helpful in speaking upon other topics as they came before the institute. Mrs. Deborah K. Livingston urged earnestly the necessity for every woman to familiarize herself with the law of her country and state, that she may intelligently fulfill her civic duties, and carefully explained the nature and scope of her textbook—"Studies in Government," urging its use by unions and individual members. At the evening session she gave a fine address on world prohibition.

Our national Evangelistic director, Rev. Helen H. Carlson, was also present, speaking but briefly, as she said her department had already been mentioned as the very foundation of every line of work undertaken. Americanization, its necessity and methods, were graphically set forth by our national and state superintendents, Mrs. Vayhinger and Mrs. Lawrence. Mrs. Vayhinger, both during the institute and at the Americanization banquet, emphasized the thought that no foreigner can ever be transformed into a true American by mechanical methods—that teaching them to read and write English, to salute the flag and so on, useful and necessary as such teaching is, is of little avail unless the highest ideals can be implanted in their hearts.

Two speaking contests, three minute speeches on Law Enforcement and "Why I should join the W. C. T. U.," were well carried out. Reports from every part of the state showed excellent work in progress. A strong resolution endorsing Governor Percival Baxter's law enforcement policy and pledging him our support in carrying it out, was unanimously adopted. Inspiring addresses were delivered at the Americanization dinner by Governor Baxter, the guest of honor, by President Roberts of Colby College, Dr. Owens of the Civic League and Mrs. Vayhinger.

Several "follow up" institutes are planned, two very successful ones having already been held at Gorham and Milo. It is hoped and expected that each county will hold at least one. Maine is awake to the dangerous conditions of the day.

Montana W. C. T. U. Doing Much Educational Work

Julia C. Seward

In spite of the severity of the winter our Montana unions are doing good work along educational lines of peace and law enforcement. Public meetings have been held all over the state and audiences addressed by many prominent men and women.

The Butte union gave a "jubilee" at the Y. M. C. A., in celebration of the second anniversary of national constitutional prohibition, when Mr. E. B. Howell, a very prominent attorney, gave a fine address on "Law Enforcement."

He said he considered the enforcement of the law prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors a stupendous task, but declared his belief that notwithstanding this fact, there is no chance that prohibition will ever be repealed in the United States. "No criminal law is enforced perfectly and a law like the Volstead act is especially difficult of enforcement. The male of the species has had a good deal to say about the abridgment of his 'rights' and his physical needs for wine and beer, but man has no such physical need that woman does not have and no one is clamoring that woman's welfare is abridged by her inability to purchase intoxicating drinks."

Dr. H. F. Carman, physician and surgeon, handled prohibition from the medical standpoint and gave a clear and comprehensive talk on the effects of alcohol on the human system. He said: "In no human life, from birth until death, is it safe to use liquors or alcohol. The human body does not require liquors and feeding the forces by false stimulation will produce disastrous results sooner or later."

"Great Work for the New Generation" was the theme of Rev. W. T. Lockwood. The youth of today are facing the fact that there are vast unsolved problems, he asserted, and spoke of the heritage of citizenship and leadership which this generation must pass on to the next. "The young who are entering upon the duties of democracy will bring to those problems new reserves of energy, natural idealism and the direct knowledge of the failure of war and strife to cure such evils."

Mrs. Matt. W. Alderson, editor of our W. C. T. U. state paper, spoke on the value of woman's vote and expressed our satisfaction that the passage of the Nineteenth amendment gave us the power of helping to enforce the Eighteenth amendment. Mrs. Alderson explained the value of the new W. C. T. U. law observance star, and urged those present to place the stars in their windows.

Good music added much to the enjoyment of the program. A troop of our Butte Boy Scouts was present and gave a wonderful exhibition of their first aid to the injured.

At Kalispell, a celebration was held in the Methodist Church, presided over by Mrs. Lucy L. Lycan, president of the local union. Judge Pomeroy made the principal address, taking as his theme, "Law Enforcement" He urged citizens to take note of the work performed by public officials, and if they had any grievances, to make them known, but not to forget to praise and thank faithful officers for the service rendered. There were other speakers and some fine music. Mrs. Huch exhibited some original posters, one of which was "The Model Water Wagon of 1922."

Similar meetings were held at Great Falls, Missoula, Bozeman, Ryegate, Three Forks and Denton, where a new union has just been organized. Four new unions have been added to Montana's list, so far, this year.

An evening meeting in memory of Frances E. Willard was held at the "Y" in Butte, February 17, Mrs. W. Caldwell, vice-president of the local union, presiding. An address on the purpose of the Frances E. Willard Memorial Fund was given by Mrs. Lilly K. Martin. This was followed by a splendid tribute to Miss Willard, by Dr. E. J. Groeneveld, who was personally acquainted with the great prohibition patriot, having met her in 1883 when she organized the W. C. T. U. in Butte.

The Independent Order of Good Templars, which is said to be the oldest temperance organization in Montana, was represented by Mr. F. R. Sarles, who spoke on "Our Mutual Aims," laying special stress upon the value of personal work among young people and especially small children. He urged more temperance work in the Sunday Schools of our churches.

Mrs. Margaret F. Clifford, wife of Rev. Cecil Leslie Clifford, pastor of Mt. View M. E. Church, gave a fine talk on "How to be a Millionaire." Mrs. Clifford, who has a charming personality, was secretary of Y. P. B. work, in Minot, North Dakota, and was also a speaker for the state W. C. T. U. She presents the big, worth-while things of life in a very attractive way. Before closing her address, she made a plea for new members —"a million women to teach total abstinence. Who can estimate the influence of a million women mobilized for God and home and every land."

At the conclusion of the program, the presiding officer asked all in the audience who had known Miss Willard to come forward and be introduced. Mrs. Davenport, one of the pioneer W. C. T. U. workers from Iowa, and Mrs. Margaret Harnan, a member of the Butte union, responded and spoke briefly. To Mrs. Harnan had fallen the honor of having Miss Willard pin upon her dress the white ribbon bow at the time she became a member of the great white ribbon army.

Fine vocal solos were sung by Mrs. H. C. Hopkins and Mr. Robert C. Logan.

Liquor Interests Show Fear Europe Will Go Dry

erate language," representing the viewpoint of the users of the beverage and the liquor interests as opposed to anything in the nature of excess, but pleading for "personal liberty" for the people.

"The good effects of alcohol must be demonstrated in the newspapers, magazines and moving pictures with convincing statistics," said Dr. Kuery, president of the Swiss Anti-Prohibition Association. "The sport world especially must be catered to. The school authorities must be won." In the moving picture houses the propaganda in favor of liquor is to be presented by means of films in which "the heroes are all portrayed as beer drinkers," and the horrors of drink are to be eliminated. Besides all this there is to be a medical campaign, carefully planned and carefully carried on, in which through the press and other agencies "authoritative medical opinion" in favor of alcohol is to be widely quoted.

"The prohibition law in America will have real influence throughout the world," is the declaration of Dr. Neumann. "We must take care that we do not repeat in old Europe the mistake committed in the United States."

Florida's Big Job

Notes From a Winter Paradise—Florida the Land of Enchantment

Lora S. LaMance, National W. C. T. U. Organizer

Homeward I rushed from Manitoba, just escaping a bitter cold wave and a heavy snow that engulfed all of that northland about the time I struck Florida, the land of perpetual fruit and flowers, where they can picnic the year around. There are many unique things about this state. Here was made the first artificial ice in the world. This is the state that puts Christmas strawberries on the New York millionaire's table at two dollars and fifty cents a quart, and ripe peaches on the Philadelphia market by the time Pennsylvania's own peach trees are blooming. She ships to the north six carloads of "truck" a day, the year around.

One-third of all the phosphate of the world comes from Florida and over a fourth of all of the sponges. These will soak up over three million gallons of water each year, and two of the state's coast towns are sponge cities. Her everglade swamps cover an area as great as Connecticut and New Jersey combined. She has the biggest alligators and the longest in Uncle Sam's dominion. She can raise onions to beat Bermuda, cabbages to beat the Dutch, oranges to beat the Spanish, and grapefruit to beat the world. She drops down five hundred miles nearer the tropics than any other part of the United States, and has turtle farms, oyster farms, tarpon headquarters and heron rookeries. She has thousands of lakes and over 11,000 islands. She is some Florida! She raises five crops of tourists, too.

My first stop was at New Smyrna, where the state W. C. T. U. executive board was in session. The Florida W. C. T. U. has a professional woman at its head, Miss Minnie E. Neal, a photographer of Jacksonville. She is business to her finger tips. She told her district presidents in plain, straight words what she expected Florida to accomplish by November 1, 1922. Here are some of the things set as the goal: Eight hundred new active members by November 1; each union to take four UNION SIGNALS for its four chief officers and give a SIGNAL subscription to each public library and high school; every member in the state to put up the pretty window poster; no union allowed to die and seventy-five new, strong, lusty unions brought into life; genuine progress in department work; and the use of the best speakers obtainable.

Plans Law Enforcement That Is!

New Smyrna is one of the old, old towns of the state, and has been under five flags, Spanish, French, British, United States and Confederate. It has some picturesque ruins to show and old canals dug generations ago. I had the pleasure of having the mayor of the town join as an honorary member the night that I spoke. The very next day he made his W. C. T. U. calling and election sure by seizing a carload of grapefruit (?) in which he found cunningly concealed, over 450 cases of liquor, valued at $30,000. It was a welcome sight to the W. C. T. U. state executive board to view this contraband stuff piled high and wide and long on the depot platform. That night it was burned—an inspiring sight to the forty white ribboners who watched it burst into flames.

That very same day, on the Tampa coast, the Federal prohibition officers seized a schooner, cargo and all, and found $30,000 worth more of liquor, and the confiscated schooner was worth another $10,000. Then, five days afterward, on the east coast, a carload of fish (?) was seized, and another $30,000 worth of liquor found. Pretty good business—$100,000 in less than a week. In less than two weeks after this, a sloop loaded with $60,000 in liquor was seized and it was burned.

Poor Florida! Over one thousand miles of sea-coast, all with caves and inlets and harbors, 11,000 islands and wet neighbors, the Bahama Islands, Bimini and Cuba, within a few hours' sail. Any smuggler can land in the night, and he has at hand mangrove marshes, everglade swamps—the greatest tangle of jungle and thicket and palmetto scrub in the whole country to hide his liquors in. The wonder is that Florida can do so well in enforcing the Eighteenth Amendment. She is putting in a splendid, far-reaching, comprehensive and co-operative plan. Under it, in a few more years, the state will be the driest of the dry.

William Jennings Bryan made a special trip to Washington to see Commissioner Haynes, who has promised to take special measures for Florida's protection; all of the large boot-legging centers are putting in Law and Order Leagues; the A. S. L. and prohibitionists in general, intend both to help prosecute law violators and to elect officers who will enforce the law; while the W. C. T. U. is to work along the same lines and keep up public sentiment for enforcement of the law.

It was a delightful experience to go over the one and only railroad in the world built over the sea—Flagler's east coast line that goes for miles through mangrove waters, where millions of mangroves stand up on funny stilt-like roots high above the water. Mangroves are land builders. They stop silt, overflow sand, drift and whatnot, leaving low, fla land behind them, and are ever marching on and on, in stilted ranks, into the shallow water ahead of them. By and by the railroad boldly jumps off into the sea, going on over sixty miles from ke to key (islands) through shallow water of the loveliest, most translucent shade of turquoise and emerald until i reaches Key West. That over-the-sea road of immense cement arches upholding the rails cost eighty million dollars a million and a quarter dollars a mile!

It was almost as great a joy to sa over the ninety miles of sea from Ke West to Cuba. Quaint, old-worlds Spanish-American Havana! There ar over 150,000 English speaking people i Cuba. There is no temperance societ there of any kind. The time is ripe f an extension of our work. Our aroun the-globe traveler, Miss Anna A. Gordo has her eyes upon Cuba. Then the will be another story to tell.

The Enemy

Frances S. Hallowes

(The S. S. "Persia" is bound for India, having among its passengers Major Orde and Bertram Harford, who have become acquainted with a Mrs. Carlyle, her small son, Eric, and Angela O'Connor, who, in the charge of Mrs. Carlyle, is on her way to marry a Deputy Commissioner at Seraneb. Harford, who is a total abstainer, is glad to note that Angela refuses to drink, and the two become good friends. Consequently, Harford is much shocked to learn that Angela has been induced by Mrs. Carlyle to take some whisky for seasickness and has been overcome by the liquor. Through pity for her he breaks his reticence on the subject, and tells her that both his parents were victims of drink, and that he had promised his mother on her deathbed never to touch alcohol in any form. Angela admits that she has made her mother a similar promise, but does not mention any particular reason therefor. One night, while his mother is at a bridge party, tiny Eric helps himself to her whisky, left out on the table in their cabin, and quickly becomes unconscious. He is discovered and cared for, but dies during the night and is buried at sea.)

CHAPTER VI

The "Persia" was in harbor. Mrs. Carlyle and Angela O'Connor, with Major Orde and Harford stood watching the approach of a boat which was nearing the ship. In it were two men—Major Carlyle and Mr. Fortescue, one to claim his wife, the other his affianced bride.

The stricken mother was closely veiled, and stood dumbly waiting, pondering in her mind how to tell the awful story of her little one's loss to the husband and father, who, with joy in his heart, anticipated the clasping of his dear ones to his heart.

Major Carlyle was the first to jump on board. His wife ran forward, and after greetings, drew him aside and walked away, doubtless to pour into his ears the tragedy of his child's death.

Angela's fiance, Frank Fortescue, strode up to her, clasped and kissed her. Harford noticed that she rather drew back than forward as he greeted her.

He was a man of about forty or a little less, a comfortable, carefully-groomed being, with an amiable exterior. His sleekness and air of content with himself proclaimed that he was one to whom the pleasures of the table loomed somewhat largely. That he was a person of importance was written on face and figure. The Deputy Commissioner of Seraneb was well-known as a successful man in his profession, well spoken of by Europeans and Indians alike.

Harford surveyed him critically. He knew that bulk is not the measure of health. He inwardly prayed a prayer that life in India might never result in a change in physique which should approximate him to Mr. Fortescue's.

That gentleman had drawn Angela's hand through his arm with an air of possession, and was scanning her face critically through his eyeglasses.

"Why, Angela, how ill you look! what is the matter? My bride must not be so pale."

She blushed. "I shall soon be better now; the voyage has been very trying. Let me introduce a friend to you. Mr. Harford—Mr. Fortescue."

Fortescue surveyed Harford with a critical look, as if to say, "Who are you to be her friend?" but he said blandly, "Glad to make your acquaintance. Where are you for?"

"I am in the same Service as you, Mr. Fortescue. I have orders to go at once to Rupasrim."

"And I am at Seraneb, Deputy Commissioner," he said, with a little swagger. "You will be but forty miles away." Then turning to Angela, "Now little woman, we must be off; this is our wedding-day, remember."

Angela went up and held out her hand to Harford. "Good-bye, I shall not forget," she said, with a lingering look in her clear young eyes.

Harford colored, and shook hands without adding more to his good-bye. He stood watching the two as they left the ship.

"She was very lovely and very sweet, and I might have won her if we had met earlier." Then he shook himself, and added, "But, no, my ideal wife is of different build and character."

"SAFEGUARDING THE NATION," a five-reel motion picture showing the effects of alcohol upon the human body and loss of efficiency due to its use, makes a good program for school or church or temperance society.

"Safeguarding the Nation" means protecting our children. This motion picture convinces one of the evil effects of alcohol upon the future generations, and the importance of protecting our children by total abstinence.

Suggestions for showing this motion picture to the best advantage and obtaining the desired results will be furnished upon request.

A Study In Threes

Three officers of a local union subscribe for THE UNION SIGNAL.

Three copies of the weekly UNION SIGNAL are each week read faithfully.

Three women as they read grow more interested and enthusiastic.

Three decisions are made to go out and win new members.

Three leaders with minds well stocked with informatiou about what the W. C. T. U. has done and is doing persuade other members to join them in the membership campaign.

Three hours' work each day for three days each week for three successive weeks are pledged by each member to the drive.

Three new members to be won is the pledge each old member makes.

Three times ten was the membership at the start. It multiplied itself by three and now it is three times thirty.

"Do you want co-operation from the Woman's Christian Temperance Union in your work?" an industrial education expert was recently asked.

"Do I?" he replied. "Why the Woman's Christian Temperance Union members are each and every one of them wearing a halo, if they only knew it. And the rest of us who are struggling to put over social programs more recent than theirs are glad enough to bask in the reflected shine from those halos."

From over the country come reports of a new welcome given to W. C. T. U. representatives who are co-operating with other organizations that have similar aims.

In Tennessee, for instance, the state superintendent of Women in Industry co-operated with the state factory inspectors and other Women in Industry organizations in a recent survey of factory conditions in Nashville. Mrs. H—— was able to report, "Employers interviewed by us without exception pledged their heartiest support to the work we have undertaken." The newspapers gave good publicity and plans have been made for extending the survey. Two weeks later our work was presented by the same superintendent at a social service conference in Franklin, Tennessee, held by the State Council of Social Agencies.

HER SON
Nellie V. Walker, Artist

The PARENT'S PRAYER

I HAVE a boy to bring up.

Help me to perform my task with wisdom and kindness and good cheer. Help me always to see him clearly, as he is. Let not my pride in him hide his faults. Let not my fear for him magnify my doubts and fears, until I make him doubting and fearful in his turn.

Quicken my judgment so that I shall know to train him to think as a child, to be in all things pure and simple as a child.

I have a boy to bring up.

Give me great patience and a long memory. Let me remember the hard places in my own youth, so that I may help when I see him struggling as I struggled then.

Let me remember the things that made me glad, lest I, sweating in the toil and strain of life, forget that a little child's laughter is the light of life.

I have a boy to bring up.

Teach me that love that understandeth all things; the Love that knows no weakness, tolerates no selfishness. Keep me from weakening my son through granting him pleasures that end in pain, ease of body that must bring sickness of soul; a vision of life that must end in death. Grant that I love my son wisely and myself not at all.

I have a son to bring up.

Give him the values and beauty and just rewards of industry. Give him an understanding brain and hands that are cunning, to work out his happiness.

I have a boy to bring up.

Help me to send him into the world with a mission of service. Strengthen my mind and heart that I may teach him that he is his brother's keeper. Grant that he may serve those who know not the need of service, and not knowing, need it the most.

I have a boy to bring up.

So guide and direct me that I may do this service to the glory of God, the service of my country, and to my son's happiness.

AMEN.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

BILL INTRODUCED TO PROVIDE UNIFORM RULE OF NATURALIZATION AND TO EQUALIZE THE CITIZENSHIP STATUS OF MEN AND WOMEN—THE HOPE OF THE WORLD IS IN CONGRESS—GOVERNMENT WOMEN CHIEFS DINE TOGETHER

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

Representative Albert Johnson of Washington has introduced a new Naturalization Bill—H. R. 10860.

The Johnson Bill—H. R. 10860—provides a new rule of naturalization and amends and codifies the laws relating to the acquisition and the loss of citizenship. It equalizes the citizenship status of men and women and esfablishes a method for the registration of aliens in order to provide for their better guidance and protection against embarrassments due to ignorance of our laws, language and institutions. A registration fee of $5.00 is provided and the monies so raised are to constitute a Citizenship Instruction Fund for the use of the public schools throughout the United States, where aliens may secure the schooling necessary for the promotion of their well being.

The bill creates a Bureau of Citizenship with much broader powers and functions than the Naturalization Bureau, which it supersedes. Under the Johnson Bill, any alien eligible to citizenship may apply for naturalization regardless of sex and whether married or single. The present naturalization law allows only men and unmarried women to be naturalized. The bill, therefore, ends automatic citizenship for foreign born, except that a person born abroad, whose mother or father is a citizen of the United States at the time of such birth, is declared to be a citizen. The present law recognizes such foreign born children as citizens if their fathers are citizens at the time of such birth.

The bill provides for a Citizenship Instruction Fund to be under the control of the Secretary of Labor for the purpose of paying the expenses of registration and allocating and paying to the local public school authorities for the employment of teachers in citizenship classes. Citizenship classes are defined as classes in which English and our institutions of government are taught, together with the usual common school or high school subjects, as determined by the local school authorities. Allotment of the fund is conditioned in each case upon the community having available a fund and using it to pay salaries for teachers of classes in which the foregoing are taught.

In the naturalization proceedings, the Johnson Bill simplifies them and at the same time raises the educational standards, while providing for the organization of classes to prepare all aliens for citizenship who desire it. It not only excludes anarchists, but those having anarchistic leanings. It simplifies the acquisition of citizenship without opening the door for undesirables by placing judicial authority with naturalization examiners upon appointment by the court to hear naturalization cases. This will relieve American citizens of all unnecessary trips to the court and especially at the time the applicants are admitted to citizenship and opens the way for court proceedings to become a dignified ceremonial. The elimination of this unnecessary appearance of witnesses will afford a cash saving of many millions annually and an economic waste of many more millions, all of which are now made necessary by the present law without contributing to the safeguarding of the citizenship of the country.

The Hope of the World is in Congress

The National Council for Reduction of Armament, with which the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union is affiliated, in its Bulletin of this week makes an appeal for support of the Four-Power Pact and states its policy on the Army and Navy appropriations. The following is quoted from the Bulletin:

Our Position

"We advocate for 1923 a fifty per cent cut in the Army and Navy appropriations, from $790,000,000 to $400,000,000, and give our reasons. We respectfully suggest that the advocates of continued preparedness give the reasons for their position. This is not a matter that can be settled emotionally, nor by impugning the motives of those who differ with us nor by calling names. We affirm that it is a question that can be settled by cool business judgment and by common sense.

"1. The success of the Conference warrants a return to peace footing. We are safer from war than we have been in a generation. We have a right to the fruits of peace.

"2. The 5—5—3 ratio has been recognized by all of the three nations that adopted it as a maximum and not a minimum program. Great Britain has indicated her wish not to build her two battleships. Japan's policy will be determined by ours.

"3. The nation cannot afford with its debt and its unemployment and its business stagnation and the high cost of living to spend more than $400,000,000 in preparing for a remote contingency, viz., a conceivable war with some unknown enemy in some future generation. No business man on earth would be so foolish.

"4. The $400,000,000 saved will be needed desperately for the constructive life of the nation in 1923. Remember that the race in economy and production is just ahead! The New York Times defends the big Army and Navy with the argument that if not used thus, Congress 'would soon find ways of spending the money.' We reply that it would not have far to look, and yet that it is conceivable that the reduction of taxes ten per cent will meet with some favor.

"5. The other governments will be glad to avail themselves of the opportunity we give to reduce their armaments and if they do not follow our example willingly they will be compelled to do so by outraged peoples. Why? Taxes are higher everywhere than here."

It is this that makes the discussion of these appropriations by the American Congress of worldwide significance. The relief from crushing taxation to support armaments, Congress and Congress alone, can give.

It cannot delegate its responsibility to the Chief Executive or his Cabinet.

Now let the people see to it that they reap the fruits of the Washington Conference. Don't delay. Write at once to your Senators.

Support the Four-Power Pact

"The Four-Power Pact is under discussion in the Senate. Discussion will be profitable. Obstructive tactics would not be. Full discussion is in line with the greater tendency towards open diplomacy which distinguished the Washington Conference from other conferences, and the people of the country should be satisfied that they understand exactly what the treaty means.

"We cannot do otherwise than continue urging loyal support for this and all the treaties as the basis for our whole peace program. If this treaty fails, the Anglo-Japanese Alliance returns to haunt us. The background of the Naval Limitation Treaty is dangerously altered. Reduction of the Army and Navy becomes problematical. The old atmosphere of suspicion returns.

Agreement Not Alliance

"Reference has been made by opponents of the treaty to a speech of Baron Uchida, of Japan, in which he is reported to have referred to this Pact as an 'Alliance.' We don't know the resources of the Japanese language in making distinctions between alliances and agreements. We don't know how careful Baron Uchida may be in the use of language. We do know that the official interpretation of the treaty was made publicly by Senator Lodge in plenary session and that he said:

" 'There is no provision for the use of force to carry out any of the terms of the agreement, and no military or naval sanction lurks anywhere in the background or under cover of these plain and direct clauses. * * * We make the experiment here in this treaty of trying to assure peace in that immense region by trusting the preservation of it tranquility to the good faith of the nations responsible for it. This agreement * * * rests only upon the will and honor of those who sign it.'

Without Armed Force

"No objection was made by the delegates present to this interpretation. No objection was made when the minutes of this meeting were approved. Moreover this interpretation has been repeated by the President of the United States in transmitting the treaty to the Senate."

Government Women Chiefs Dine Together

The third dinner this winter of women executives in government positions was held this week. Miss Nila F. Allen, the Child Labor tax division, was toastmistress. Miss Georgia Hopley, the first woman in the country to be appointed prohibition agent, was present and spoke. Miss Hopley declared that her task in the prohibition work is not the detection of law-breakers, but is to arouse on the part of all the people a spirit of willingness to observe and obey the law.

Other women present were Judge Mary O'Toole, the first woman in Washington to sit on the municipal bench; Miss Adelia Stewart, the first woman bank examiner in the United States; Mrs. Henrietta Calvin, Bureau of Education; Miss Mary Dempsey, Department of Commerce; Miss Rena Rosenberg, Miss Katherine Lenroot, Department of Labor; Major Julia Stimson, War Department; Miss Claribel Barnett, Department of Agriculture; Miss Emily Spillman, Department of Justice, and Miss Laura Tracey, Civil Service Commissioner.

Christian Endeavorers Urge Prohibition Enforcement

Among the resolutions adopted by the hirty-sixth annual convention of the hode Island Christian Endeavor Union, eld recently in Olneyville, R. I., was ne asking the state legislature to enact ws for the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment.

The Cuyahoga County (Ohio) Christian Endeavor Union, at a rally, condemned the Cleveland city council for s adoption of the light wine and beer esolution, declaring councilmen violated eir oath of office.

A Search for the Cause of Crime

It is reported that a committee has een appointed by the American Bar ssociation to prepare a report which is be given at their next annual meeting, making public the results of a determined search for the cause of the -called increase of crime and general wlessness in the United States. According to the press, investigations thus r have pointed to three alleged causes, e recent war, penalties unfitted to the ime, and eagerness of lawyers to represent law-breakers, but "no one of them n properly be termed a cause," says e Christian Science Monitor, in cautioning the general public not to confuse use with effect.

nforcement Sentiment Growing In Mississippi

Sentiment for the enforcement of the ohibition law is steadily increasing in ssissippi, as evidenced by the number convictions secured during the recent m of the Federal court. Some of the otleggers who pleaded guilty expected niency, but the court showed none. e maximum penalty was inflicted in cases of conviction, whether for a st offense or not. Municipal and state cers are showing a great desire to cerate with the Federal agents.

eylon Legislative Council Passes Resolution Looking Toward Total Prohibition

Hon. W. Duraiswami of the Ceylon Legiative Council, at a recent meeting induced the following resolution:

"That in view of the prevalence of publ opinion in favor of total prohibition o the use of drugs and alcoholic and ioxicating liquors, except for medicinal poses, this Council desires that the gvernment should so direct its excise aministration as to attain total prohibion within a reasonable time."

The resolution was carried, ten voting f and nine against it.

U. S. Representative Cooper Regrets Action of A. F. L.

Speaking as a holder of a union card, Representative Cooper of Ohio recently essed in the House his regret over th action taken by the executive coun c of the American Federation of Labor in urging support of candidates for cong ss favorable to modification of the Vstead law to permit the sale of light wies and beer, and declared that the wrking people are not clamoring for th return of the liquor traffic. "With th modification proposed," said Mr. Cooper, "the country would be worse off than now, even if the law is violated, as beer advocates claim. Liquor has always defied the law, as much or more before prohibition as since."

Students Protest Against False Statements of Wets

Incensed at the misleading accounts in the foreign press of the so-called failure of prohibition in the United States, seventeen Americans, representing twelve different states of the Union, post-graduate students at the University of Edinburgh, Scotland, recently signed a statement setting forth the outstanding facts as to the undeniable success of the dry law. This was read at a meeting addressed by Rev. Dr. Norman Maclean, who had just returned from a visit to the United States, and who spoke on "American Prohibition: Is It a Failure?"

No man is above the law and no man is below it; nor do we ask any man's permission when we require him to obey it. Obedience to the law is demanded as a right; not asked as a favor.—Theodore Roosevelt.

Turning Point in Law Enforcement, Says State Prohibition Director

"There is a growing resentment throughout the state, against the illicit liquor trade and with better centralization of power and more co-operation among the authorities, I predict that the turning point is coming in the enforcement of the Volstead act," says F. A. Hazeltine, recently appointed Federal prohibition director for the state of Washington, as quoted by the press.

"Organization of law enforcement leagues is being effected in all parts of the state and their efforts in arousing public opinion will effectively counteract the clamor of the anti-prohibitionists, who are more noisy than numerous, and generally operate under the guise of 'personal liberty' organizations."

Few Liquor Permits in South Dakota

It is said that neither druggists nor physicians of South Dakota care to take out liquor permits. Only six drug firms and twenty-four practicing physicians last year availed themselves of the privilege.

Will Withhold Executive Clemency

Governor E. Lee Trinkle of Virginia, who took office the first of February, discussing in his inaugural address the question of prohibition and law enforcement, gave expression to the following declaration, according to published reports:

"After mature and deliberate consideration, feeling that the violation of our prohibition laws is the chief and prime cause of our criminal activity, I here and now announce that in all cases (save where the question of actual guilt is involved) those who are convicted of dealing in and handling intoxicating beverages for monetary gain, or hope of such gain, will, so far as I am concerned, be expected to serve out such sentences as the courts may impose, and the exercise of executive clemency need not be sought."

Illinois Constitutional Convention Sanctions Bible in Public Schools

Bible study may be made part of the Illinois public school curriculum at any time the General Assembly elects, under a section of the bill of rights adopted recently by the Constitutional Convention.

Protest by Chicagoans and downstate delegates that the proposal to sanction Bible instruction in the public schools was veering dangerously toward a state religion and possibly, intolerance, were met by replies that the suggested course would serve to "keep the boys out of the penitentiaries and keep them off the gallows," reports the Chicago Herald Examiner.

Two thousand school teachers of central Illinois, attending their annual convention, held this year in Springfield, unanimously adopted a resolution commending the Constitutional Convention for its action.

Equal Suffrage Bill Introduced in Great Britain

A bill designed to extend suffrage to women on the same terms as men was recently introduced in the British House of Commons by Lord Robert Cecil.

Woman Honored by Belgian Academy

The newly founded Belgian Academy recently paid special tribute to feminine literary ability by admitting to its membership Mme. de Noailles, authoress of "Eternal Forces."

"Clean-Up" in Baton Rouge For Protection of Students

A Citizen's League has been formed in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, for the purpose of suppressing establishments where liquor is sold and closing gambling resorts, thus making the town safe and clean for the students who are attending the state university. As a result of recent raids by the prohibition enforcement officers, there are said to be only about two places left where "moonshine" is sold, and a complete "cleanup" is anticipated in the near future.

The Anti-Alcoholic Movement In Norway

The good results of prohibition will become even more obvious after the first difficult transition period has passed, says the Stavenger Aftenblad of Norway.

"We know that prohibition has decreased misdemeanors caused by drunkenness by fifty per cent., despite the fact that no product in any country has received so much advertising lately as liquor in Norway. The result does honor to the power of resistance of the Norwegian people."

No Time For Mercy

"It's high time to stop the moonshine traffic, and leniency will never do it," declared municipal judge C. L. Smith of Minneapolis, in sentencing two men in federal employ, one a military instructor, the other an army mechanic. Both were arrested for drunkenness, and the judge took note of their occupations, saying, "You're fine examples to be teaching the youth of our nation. You are in federal employ, yet you break the federal laws. Such men as you tear down the foundation of our youth."

ENFORCING PROHIBITION IN THE UNITED STATES

I. WILL IT STAY? YEA, VERILY!

W. C. POOLE

In 1913 I sat in an office in one of our city skyscrapers and tried to figure how and when the prohibition amendment would be ratified by the necessary three-fourths, or thirty-six, of the states. In an article I wrote at the time, I named the year as 1923, and conceded that New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island and Illinois would never ratify the amendment by 1923; and at the same time I placed Maryland, Connecticut, Wisconsin, California, Massachusetts and Missouri in the doubtful column, and left thirty-eight states sure to ratify the amendment by 1923. My friends called me visionary. I stretched my own faith to believe so much.

The amendment was ratified by all the states except New Jersey, Rhode Island and Connecticut nearly five years sooner, or in one-half the time I predicted; and all the larger states like New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Ohio, Missouri and California ratified. That is a matter of record. Prohibition is ten years ahead of where some of its best friends ten years ago predicted it would now be. It arrived in spite of opposition from a certain financial interest—the largest single financial interest in the country. It has gotten there in spite of political methods which furnish the darkest pages of political history in our nation.

Will It Stay?

Fifteen years ago I asked one of my friends with large experience in government and social laws, that very question. I shall never forget his answer as he said, "Yes, reforms in the history of the human race never go backward." That gave me a new idea. Progress goes forward and not backward. No nation which has banished slavery has ever gone back to it, or could be induced to do so. No nation which has established reasonable standards of education has outlawed them.

The human race learns very slowly what is good for it—but it learns—and having found by experience what is best, the law of self preservation does the rest except with a hopeless minority.

Probably the greatest reason for my faith that prohibition will stay was furnished by an ex-saloon keeper who had made some twenty-five thousand dollars with a bar-room at a country cross-roads. His county had voted dry. The wets wanted resubmission. He was wet as ever, but he was a one hundred per cent politician and understood politics. When his friends called on him for help to get resubmission, he answered them, "Boys, it's no use. You know I have always been with you and am with you yet. But when we had a hundred saloons in this county and wholesale whisky dealers donated fifty thousand dollars to keep it wet, we lost. We have no more chance. Our financial help is gone and we have no place to get the boys together. You know our boys read little or nothing and they have no meeting place."

His philosophy of politics gave me a new vision. 200,000 saloons—lawful saloons—have been closed. Each controlled from ten to one thousand votes. Each was a breeding place for more saloon propaganda. They dominated more than 3,000,000 American votes. The financial backing of saloon politicians is wrecked. The chief financial interest now has a gambler's chance of getting fifteen or twenty dollars a quart for bootleg whisky. Much of the saloon property has been put to better use. Thousands of those engaged in the business have found better employment. My authority on government questions, and the country barkeeper were both right. The saloon will not come back.

Will the People Resort to Home Brew?

Long before prohibition came, I put to an authority on social customs and conditions, from one of our largest universities, the question, "Will the people resort to home brew?" His answer was a decided "No. They will learn better. The majority of people worth while will do what is best for their welfare at all times, barring a few exceptions to the rule." We are now in the midst of the test to his answer. Will it prove true?

We have reached the sand of the shore but the waves on the beach and the undertow stir up the sand and mud. The drys are far ahead of their highest expectations of ten years ago. Some serpents will wriggle till the sun goes down even when their heads are cut off. The saloon was a cold blooded reptile looking for hot blooded victims. With breeding places for saloon sympathizers eliminated, they will become less every year. With education, finance, government, politics in the hands of the drys, with the forts and guns of the liquor traffic captured, the victors will, and, should, dictate their own terms.

Can Prohibition Laws Be Enforced?

Can prohibition laws be enforced? I answer that question with some others. Shall the American people be governed by outlaws? Shall America hand her government over to anarchists? Shall perjurers govern the highest civilized nation on earth? I may be wrong and advanced in my thinking but I believe that the intelligence and moral conscience of my country is such that if necessary it would rise up and gather together all outlaws who are past redemption, and all who hamper the progress of our homes and people and cast them into the sea as the garbage from our cities is removed to keep it from breeding disease. Of course this will not be necessary. Apparently three fourths—probably more—of the men once engaged in the legal sale of liquor four years ago are trying to obey the law I rather think a still larger proportion of them are. Most of the present bootleggers were bootleggers when we had nearly a quarter million saloons in the nation. This is specially true in rural districts with which I am familiar. A there were moonshiners in the days of the saloons to save a tax of a few dollars on each gallon, so there will be outlaws to make a dozen dollars on each quart—if they can. But the demand will grow less the novelty will wear off, the folly will appear. Appetite is no longer cultivated by a quarter million saloons giving out to children, to create adult customers candy soaked in alcohol.

Watch the Undertow

My feeling is one of safety, but the drys should watch the undertow. It treacherous and may be dangerous. The drys have won ten years ahead of time Too much jubilation is dangerous. They are in the period of reaction which may last for several years, possibly until after the next presidential election. Saloon politicians should have learned something from last year when the whisky bosses and their chosen candidates were beaten by the greatest majority ever known in this nation. The drys need something to awaken them. It may come sooner than we expect. They have a habit of doing something when they are aroused and the longer they sleep, the more they do when they get into action. Their work is not done. That work is enforcement. Enforcement should be quick. It should be permanent. It should be lasting. It should be at the least possible cost.

Prohibition Seen from the Standpoint of a Half Century of Law Practice

Mr. Will D. Gould of Los Angeles, Cal., who recently celebrated his seventy-seventh birthday, and who has just rounded out fifty years in the active practice of his profession, the law, has been a life-long prohibition crusader. "Speaking of the Eighteenth Amendment, and the likelihood that it will remain a law and be enforced, Mr. Gould states that in his opinion the country will be drier every year," says the Los Angeles Times. "'Prohibition is a great economic question,' he states. 'It took a long time for the United States to see that the liquor traffic was economically wrong, but when the country went dry it went dry for keeps. The railroads of this country gave prohibition its greatest impetus when they declared that men who drank could no longer sit at the throttles of their engines.'

"Mr. Gould is of the opinion that so sweeping a reform cannot be expected to work out in a few years, but he thinks it will eventually be in full force. According to his information, millions of people have already quit drinking and there are millions who never wanted to drink. Evolution from generation to generation is what will eventually make the country bone-dry, he thinks. Young people will soon be educated to know that liquor drinking is economically as well as physically a bad thing for the individual and the nation.

"Asked if he didn't think that a certain percentage of the people resent the idea of having their lives regulated by legislation and bumping into a 'don't' every little while, Mr. Gould replied:

"'Nine out of the Ten Commandments are don'ts. I'm glad they can't be amended. Had such a thing been possible a lot of people would have had them amended long ago.'"

The test of any law is strict observance. Friends of the amendment will welcome such general inforcement as a vindication of their belief.

Those who do not believe in the law should welcome the most drastic application as the speediest means of repeal—but do not wager any large amounts that even the most ardent wet really believes that the law will ever be repealed. Since it has come to stay, let it be a law, not a half-law.—South Bend (Ind.) Times.

WHAT IS A POLICEWOMAN?

Mina C. Van Winkle, Lt., Woman's Bureau, Metropolitan Police, Washington, D. C.

Question: What is a police officer?

Answer: A police officer is a man or woman member of a body organized for the protection of society through the prevention and detection of crime, the enforcement of law, and for preventive and protective work with girls and boys.

Q: When did women first become associated with police work?

A: As early as 1881 the question of police matrons was discussed by the W. C. T. U. in Portland, Maine; a police matron was at that time in charge of police mission. In 1882 the police matrons of Brooklyn, Chicago, Portland and other cities were regarded as "angels of mercy to desolate and despairing hearts." The protection afforded women and girls by women, to whom was committed even the small measure of police power given the matrons, led to the appointment of women police officers. The cities first to take this new departure were Los Angeles, Seattle, Portland, Oregon; and Portland, Maine.

Q: What are the duties of a policewoman?

A: The special duties of a policewoman are the prevention of conditions that make for delinquency. Her work includes supervision of dance halls and other public amusement places; street patrol with the object of preventing girls from drifting into delinquency; securing evidence against those who have wronged girls or women; apprehending missing persons and locating the parents or guardians; detecting shoplifters and pickpockets; fixed post duty in railroad stations with a view to apprehending missing girls, questionable persons and psychopathic cases; seeing generally that conditions are safe for even the youngest girl who may be obliged to travel; careful interviews and investigations of all cases that come to the attention of the policewoman; securing physical and mental examinations; desk duty in the Woman's Bureau of the Police Department, careful keeping of records; supervision and control of the House of Detention; protective work with girls; adjustment of domestic difficulties; advising and guiding both parents and children in cases of delinquency. All of these duties and more should be covered day and night by a sufficient number of policewomen.

Q: Do policewomen wear uniforms?

A: A few of them do, but the best work is done by quietly dressed women who pass unnoticed in the crowd. They do not walk a regular beat as do patrolmen. Some are assigned to certain localities at times, but much work is brought to them, and much is done in the way of investigation. They go where most needed.

Q: Does the policewoman carry the same equipment as the policeman?

A: Not necessarily. If working at night in dangerous places it is well to be protected with some weapon to be used in emergency. Otherwise, they need only badge, whistle, flashlight and the box key.

Q: In what way can the W. C. T. U. committee on Social Morality co-operate with the police department in a village, town or city?

A: By seeing that each community has abundant and adequately supervised public recreation; that each community has policewomen who shall measure up to the United States civil service standards; that suitable quarters are provided for the policewoman's work where there will be privacy for interviews and the keeping of proper records.

> "Your true democracy must have leaders; and the better the leaders, the better the democracy. These leaders must be men of the most gracious and sincere manners, the most cultivated imagination, the finest self-sacrifice, the highest ideals. Wherever we need leaders, we need just such men. And such men do not just grow. They must be developed and inspired somewhere."

By watching the work of policewomen after appointment and keeping informed as to whether the police chief and the police department, in general, are in sympathy with their work and enabling them to give to the community their best service.

By establishing a woman's bureau, wherever warranted by population, with the women in such a bureau directly responsible, through a director, to the chief of police. This bureau should work in close co-operation with the whole police department.

By securing for the police department the necessary laws and regulations; and for the city, institutions that will enable the police to do efficient work and by watching closely to see if the departments are giving clean police service.

By seeing that protective and preventive work is extended to include boys.

By securing houses of detention where there are none.

In order to do good police work special places of detention are necessary. For nearly twenty years it has been realized that women and children should be detained in a shelter outside of the station house, jail or workhouse. There is steadily evolving a definite tendency for each city to establish a house of detention with provisions for occupation, education and recreation and careful classification, so far as possible, of inmates, facilities for bathing, a plentiful supply of clean institutional clothes, good food, careful supervision by the highest type of employees and educators, and a clinic for making both physical and mental examinations, that the information obtained thereby may be taken to court in order to enable judges to make intelligent decisions. A poor building with a good personnel is superior to an imposing structure with an incapable, unskilled, characterless, irresponsible staff.

Q: What are the factors that are the cause of temptation to girls as recognized by policewomen and others engaged in protective work?

A: Lack of training for parenthood.

Refusal of young people to submit to home discipline.

Their custom of leaving home and friends to secure employment.

Lack of training in trade or profession with the resulting inadequate earning capacity.

Unsuitable occupations with attending temptations.

The stage and motion picture business with their fascination for the young girl.

The loose way in which young girls make acquaintances among those of the opposite sex.

Ignorance on the part of young people of the sacredness of the sex function.

Bad dancing and the questionable dance hall—large contributors to the problem of immorality.

Passionate love scenes in the films, and the films in general that depict crime unpunished.

Misuse of pleasure boats and automobiles for immorality.

Q: Is the W. C. T. U. prepared to carry forward this work?

A: It is its moral and civic duty to do so through the power of the ballot. Women have not begun to realize the wonderful boon which is now theirs in the privilege of citizenship. With intelligent thinking behind this great instrument for good, there is nothing that they cannot do, nothing they cannot achieve. Not only should the W. C. T. U. see that policewomen are appointed but it should make sure that every police department honestly performs the duties for which it was organized and that the police chiefs be not made the footballs of politics. The police after all only reflect the sentiments of the citizens of a community. No city is better than its police department. Unless every police officer is conscientious, intelligent and allowed to enforce the law without interference by corrupt political influences the city will be rotten to the core. You have the right to exact of your chief of police the same sincere leadership that you exact of the clergyman in your church. If you are not getting efficient administration of the law then it is time to clean house thoroughly. It is just as important that you interest yourselves in policemen as in policewomen. A corrupt police department can block the best work of policewomen. There must not only be the extension of the mother interest, through the policewoman, to the girls under arrest, but every policeman on his beat should be a preventive and protective agent for boys and girls. His record should rest not wholly on the number of arrests and convictions that he makes but also on the amount of preventive and protective work to his credit. We cannot make it too clear that the police are strongly influenced by the attitude of the citizens, who have a mighty responsibility in the matter. Corruption is not inherent in a police department; it comes from without. Good citizens are in the majority but sit supinely by while the corrupting minority rule. Instead of constructive criticism and help there is constantly destructive criticism by the respectable majority.

WOMEN MUST USE THEIR VOTES TO FIGHT THE VICE EVIL

More women in politics and more activity among women in handling their community problems was the demand made on the General Federation of Women's Clubs by Dr. Valeria H. Parker, executive head of the government Social Hygiene Board and National W. C. T. U. director of the department of Social Morality. Dr. Parker, though located in voteless Washington, still maintains her residence in Hartford, Connecticut, for voting purposes.

"Women must have courage to fight the vast network of interests which form the vice rings in every city," said Dr. Parker. "The fight is made in politics. Only when women get actively interested in politics as it relates to their daily lives do they realize what power lies in their votes.

"There are ten thousand people hacking away at the twigs and branches for every one who is cutting at the roots of the vicious social conditions which exist in every city. Politics is the soil in which commercialized vice, graft, drug peddling and bootlegging grow. This soil in each community may be sweet and clean, or it may be stony and poor, and produce nothing but weeds. It is up to the women of each community to say what kind of a civic garden they wish for their children.

"Vice is ninety-nine per cent commercialized. It is simply a money-making business for a certain type of degenerate people. The police can stop it if they wish. But public opinion must make them wish. Women can make that public opinion, and express it through their votes.

"Women have no right to sit at home wrapped in the ignorance they call innocence. I have never known a woman who was not shocked and angered when this veil of ignorant innocence was lifted from her eyes, and commercialized vice in all its sordid trappings was exposed to her view.

"Women's votes will make police departments apply the laws. They will make the judges enforce the penalties. Women's taxes help pay the bills. They will find out why laws vital to their happiness, welfare and health are not lived up to."

The work of the Social Hygiene Board is directed against vice as it affects our men in uniform. Investigators for the board examine into conditions existing near the camps and ports. The results of these investigations, with irrefutable evidence, is given to the military authorities in the camps, and in Washington, and to the local police forces. The conditions are then cleared up by raids which are conducted by the local authorities. The Social Hygiene Board has closed up seventy-seven red-light districts. Nearly eight hundred cities have cleaned up loose conditions. The average disease rate in the army has dropped from a pre-war average rate of ninety per thousand to about sixty-two per thousand.

When the board was started, appropriations were made by Congress to establish in the various states social disease clinics as a public health measure. The appropriation last year was reduced to less than one-fourth of the previous year and the state allotments were eliminated. The work was continued last year through interesting women's organizations and securing volunteer help. In spite of the record of accomplishment no appropriation for the board has been included in the budget now before Congress.

W. C. T. U. Alert to Improve Social Conditions

Annie G. Porritt

In the reports from various parts of the country sent by the field agents to headquarters of the U. S. Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board in Washington, mention is frequently made of excellent co-operation given by state and local W. C. T. U.'s to the agents in their work of combating vice. These reports have been especially pleasing to Dr. Valeria H. Parker, the executive secretary of the Board. Dr. Parker is also national director of Social Morality for the W. C. T. U. and it is her strong desire that the W. C. T. U. should work heartily with the Board for the protection of the soldiers and sailors, and incidentally for the betterment of social conditions in all communities near army posts or naval stations in which the Board's agents are at work.

The following message from Dr. Parker is addressed to every W. C. T. U. woman in America:

"My knowledge of the ardent interest of the members of the W. C. T. U. in the elimination of bad conditions and of temptations which lead to the moral and physical destruction of young people has given me encouragement in undertaking the work of the Government Social Hygiene Board. One particular instance of co-operation was especially encouraging. This was the appeal of W. C. T. U. members in San Francisco to the agent of the Board regarding immoral entertainment given in the Thalia in Chinatown. The agent, Miss Calderwood, promptly responded to the appeal, and the alertness of the W. C. T. U. members in reporting what they had seen made it possible for her to present the facts to the prosecuting attorney. As a result, the Thalia has been closed and the furniture and fixtures sold.

"Wherever the Interdepartmental Board agents are stationed, I urge the W. C. T. U. to co-operate closely with them. Such co-operation can make possible good work in the community. Government operation is limited. The Board agents are stationed only in the vicinity of army posts and naval stations, and the Board is entrusted by Congress not with the care of the civilian population but solely with that of the army and naval forces. But by co-operation on the part of the W. C. T. U. the work can be extended, and the experience of the Board agents enables them to give the guidance which is so necessary in the difficult work of the Social Morality department."

Nineteenth Amendment the Bulwark of the Eighteenth

In these days of stress, when some of our prominent periodicals are printing editorials stating that "since prohibition cannot be enforced, we should modify the law," and declaring themselves therefore in favor of light wines and beer, there are certain facts that need to be emphasized repeatedly. Perhaps they have not been better stated than in an address recently made by the treasurer of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, Mrs. Margaret C. Munns, before a large gathering.

"The Constitution of the United States is the fundamental law of the land. Every alien who becomes a citizen takes his oath to support the Constitution which is now equivalent to saying he will uphold the prohibition law," said Mrs. Munns.

"No man is a loyal citizen who do not obey the law. He may not appro of it, but if he is a patriot he will ob it. The man who patronizes the illi traffic of the moonshiner, the rum r ner, the bootlegger, is as much a cri nal as they, for without him they co not ply their lawless business.

"Honest officials can enforce the l If law is not enforced it is because ficials are either corrupt or inefficie Public sentiment must demand that either case the incapable officer be placed and the people be allowed to joy the benefits of prohibition to wh they are entitled.

"Opposition to prohibition co largely from those who were financi interested in the continuance of the i quor traffic.. They are making a f and desperate effort to retrieve the b ness that paid immense profits at expense of the patron.

FACTS THAT YOU SHOULD GET REPRINTED IN YOUR LOCAL PAPERS

99 Out of 156 Used Alcohol

"There are 156 patients in the hospitals classed as bedfast," says the Ohio state report of the criminals in the state hospitals. "Of these, ninety-nine were users of alcoholic beverages in civilian life, and the fathers of eighty-six of them drank."

Statistics Worth Studying

In a survey of the results of prohibition made by the New York Herald, the following facts are given showing the beneficial effect of national prohibition on home life:

"Where court records have been examined it has been found that there has been an improvement in domestic relations and consequently fewer cases of this sort taken to court. A typical instance is supplied by the Boston correspondent, who submits a letter from the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

"According to this letter the society made a study of 311 cases in 1921, comparing them with 338 cases handled in 1917. The two tables follow:

MARCH, 1921—311 CASES.

Physical neglect	112
Moral neglect	76
Non-support	57
Widowed parent	57
Intemperance	53	—16.5%
Separation of parents	46
Illegitimacy	44

MARCH, 1917—338 CASES.

Physical neglect	149
Intemperance	132	—39%
Non-support	109
Immorality	100
Separation of parents	83
Moral neglect	76
Illegitimacy	72

"The society makes this comment:

'From this, with particular reference to intemperance, it will be observed that in 1917 intemperance came second in frequency of occurrence as a social causal factor, whereas in the group studied in March 1921, it came fifth in order of frequency of occurrence. This makes the ratio of decrease 42.3 per cent. This indicates quito obviously that prohibition has brought definite, tangible results, very beneficial to child and family life, and that intemperance is figuring as a causal factor to a considerably less extent.'"

Lives Saved by Eighteenth Amendment

The state board of health of Michigan sent out the following item of news under date of February 27:

"Alcoholism and home-brewism claimed only approximately one-third as many victims in Michigan in 1921 as 'Good licker' killed in 1917. Proof rests with the vital statistics of the state department of health. In 1917 a total of 255 deaths was credited to alcoholism; in 1921 there were 94. Of these, 29 occurred in Detroit and 65 in the rest of the state. Seven of the 94 were women. December and January, the holiday season with numerous festive gatherings, were high months with 24 deaths.

"'Prevented deaths from other diseases—tuberculosis, for instance—comprise the greatest savings from prohibition,' according to Dr. W. J. V. Deacon, director of the bureau of communicable diseases. 'Michigan,' he says, 'would never have been able to reduce her tuberculosis death rate from 93.1 per 100,000 population in 1917 to 71.6 in 1921, if the Eighteenth Amendment had not been enacted. Many lives, especially of children, have been saved with the diverting of incomes from alcohol to the grocer, baker and milkman.

"'Kansas, for forty years a dry state, has considerably fewer tuberculous children than Michigan,' he continued. 'With the agitation over deaths from alcoholism poisoning today, it should be remembered that a few years ago legitimate beverages caused more deaths, and that more children died of malnutrition and tuberculosis than at present.'"

Dry Law Agrees with "Johnny and Jenny"

"New schools are replacing saloons throughout the United States," says the Boonton (N. J.) Times. "This is one of the greatest benefits to the human race that is directly traceable to prohibition. There are fewer ill-clad and undernourished children in the primary and grammar schools. More high schools are in demand. All the colleges and universities are swamped with applicants for entrance. No longer do children of primary age arrive in Boonton schools in a state of semi-intoxication from wine breakfasts, according to foreign customs and ideas of nourishment, we are told by Boonton teachers. Fathers and mothers in moderate circumstances, who before prohibition days found that they needed the money Johnny and Jenny could bring them from the factories, and who believed that higher education came too high for them, now are taking great pride in being able to send their children on to the high schools. Their ideals and ambitions are no longer smothered by the fumes of alcohol. Father's wages are now 100 per cent strong for family use. Many boys and girls who now have this new opportunity have grasped it with the full strength of their native ability and are pushing on through the high schools and into the colleges and universities. All this means that the standard of civilization in the United States is rising. It is a national evolution which, if it continues, will some day make Americans the most respected people in the world, for culture and moral integrity."

WHAT ONE LOCAL UNION DID

TRY IT IN YOUR CITY

The following result of investigations made by W. C. T. U. workers in their own neighborhoods, reported at a local union meeting, and afterwards published in a Boston newspaper, are reprinted from an article by Mrs. Emma L. Tranzeau, which appeared in the latest issue of the Massachusetts W. C. T. U. paper.

The plan ought to be adopted by every local union. Try it, and send the results of your surveys to THE UNION SIGNAL, and to your local papers for publication.

Editor.

A few inquiries made of people in their own neighborhoods and reported at a regular meeting, by members of the Boston Central Woman's Christian Temperance Union, brought out the following list of benefits which was published in at least one of the Boston papers,, the Transcript, February 9.

"Seventy-five dollars worth of dental work where none was ever possible before; a Ford car and time to ride in it, instead of toiling over the wash tub; a horse and wagon and kindling wood route, instead of a day's labor alternating with serving time for drunkenness; a child's board bill paid by the father, instead of by the state—are a few of the striking instances of the benefits of prohibition personally known to the members of the Union.

"One member learned from a Somerville parent and teachers' association that a fund formerly kept for buying clothes for children who could not go to school for lack of them now had no applicants. A similar report came from an East Boston school where such a fund is now idle.

"A teacher in a school for backward children in the North End told a member of the great improvement in her pupils in the matter of food and clothing.

"One school boy volunteered information about a family of children in his school that used to be frequently absent because their father drank up all his money and couldn't buy them clothes. 'And now,' he added, 'Gee! they dress better than I do.'

"A church visitor connected with Park Street Church and another with a church in Roxbury told a member that families who before prohibition required help from the church poor funds no longer called for such aid.

"A bank official told one lady that whatever his own opinion about prohibition, it certainly made it easier to carry three boys through college.

"Two other bank officials interviewed reported that the savings accounts had greatly increased since prohibition and new accounts been opened every day.

"From a Jamaica Plain teacher one member learned that there had been a wonderful improvement in the children's school savings accounts. A transfer of $700 had just been made from that school to the savings bank. Before prohibition the children's pennies had frequently to be taken from their banks to help meet the family expenses.

"A former home for inebriate women known to some of the members used to be always full, but now had so few inmates that it had been turned into a convalescent home.

"The change in the condition of former washerwomen was illustrated by a member whose friend had been astonished at meeting her pre-prohibition laundress in a party dress at the Elks' ball. 'Why, Agnes, you here?' exclaimed the ex-employer. 'Oh, yes, my man is sober now,' was the reply."

Welcome, New Jersey!

Although a trifle late, New Jersey is nevertheless heartily welcomed to the ratification sisterhood. The approval, by the so-called "wettest" state in the Union, of the Eighteenth Amendment two years after it has become the law of the land, is a spectacular answer to the insinuations of the pro-liquor interests that the people have no use for national prohibition. New Jersey not only refused to join her forty-five sister states in ratifying the dry law, but elected a governor notoriously wet and, through his influence, passed a measure providing for the sale of beer containing 3.5 per cent of alcohol. It is this state, encumbered by a superlatively wet chief executive, that today asks the privilege of setting itself right with the world and having its name placed on record as ratifying the Eighteenth Amendment.

The next time you hear a personal liberty advocate declare that prohibition is unpopular, call his attention to the action of the legislature of New Jersey.

WORLD'S W. C. T. U. CONVENTION, PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA, NOVEMBER 11-16, 1922
NATIONAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION, ATLANTIC CITY, NEW JERSEY, NOVEMBER 18-23, 1922

Let Us Not Be Caught Napping

While many of the states will not hold their primaries or conventions till late August or September, some are to choose their candidates in the early spring or summer, South Dakota the last of this month, Illinois on April 11, and Indiana and Pennsylvania in May. White ribboners in other commonwealths will watch with great interest and many prayers the outcome of the primaries in these four states in the vanguard. We trust that not a single member of the W. C. T. U. will be found wanting at the polls when the fateful day arrives! Let us remember the vital necessity of choosing the right sort of candidates, that we may later have good men to represent us at Washington.

Those Other Wine and Beer Campaigns

"Worried over that wine and beer talk of the antis?" remarked a resident of one of the older prohibition states. "Why should I be? Didn't they try the same trick on our state just after we got teetotal prohibition, and didn't we defeat them by a bigger majority than when we first voted?"

Let no one imagine that the antis are starting something new in their advocacy of a modification of the prohibitory law to permit the traffic in wine and beer as the only way to secure the enforcement of the dry law. The attack on the national law is on the same lines as was their drive on the state prohibition laws of Washington, Colorado, Oregon, Michigan and Ohio.

Colorado voted by a majority of 11,572 for its constitutional prohibition amendment. The liquor interests initiated a beer amendment and it was defeated by a majority of 85,792.

Washington adopted state-wide prohibition by a majority of 18,632, and later defeated a measure for the return of beer by a majority of 146,556.

Oregon adopted constitutional prohibition by a majority of 36,480, and a few months after prohibition went into effect, by a majority of 54,626 defeated a beer measure.

Michigan gave a majority of 68,624 for the prohibitory amendment, and the next year by a majority of 207,520 turned down a beer and wine measure.

Ohio gave a majority of 25,759 for the constitutional prohibition amendment and twelve months afterwards a proposed law for the manufacture and sale of 2.75 per cent liquor was defeated by a majority of 29,781.

The brewers couldn't fool these states into invalidating their real prohibitory laws that were proving an asset of inestimable value by the passage of measures that were intended to bring back the saloons and all the evils that attend them. Neither will the United States be fooled!

Drive the Facts Deep Into the Public Mind

"Let every member inform himself, then go in as he must if he knows the facts, for the biggest fight we have ever made against the enemies of law and order, the brewers, the would-be saloonkeepers, and all those who would break down the victories for morals, for decency, and for temperance which have been won at great cost." These words were spoken by Bishop Nicholson of the Methodist church in a communication to Epworth Leaguers, but they could as well be taken to heart by the members, young and old, of every church.

If the people know the facts regarding the untold benefits that have accrued from even a partial enforcement of the prohibitory law, such as childhood made healthier and happier, manhood returned to self-respect, savings accounts opened, homes re-established, and the innumerable other radiant results due to a state of dryness, they will throw themselves heart and soul into the fight for the enforcement and retention of the dry law.

If the people know the facts as to what will be certain to happen if the prohibitory law is weakened in any particular and the traffic in wine and beer allowed by law, (with the temptation to drink presented on every street corner and the liquor interests in control of politics, they will give their enthusiastic support to the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment.

For the next few months let it be our business to see that our fellow citizens KNOW THE REAL FACTS ABOUT PROHIBITION through publishing them far and wide in the press and from pulpit and platform. Knowing the truth about prohibition men and women will come to realize keenly that it will be the greatest of calamities if America is not given an actual chance to show to the world what a nation emancipated from the liquor traffic can do and be.

THE APRIL ISSUE OF THE YOUNG CRUSADER FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOLS

Each month THE YOUNG CRUSADER furnishes anti-cigaret teaching. As the quarterly temperance lesson for Sunday, April 23, is on cigarets, more than the usual amount of space in the issue for the month will be devoted to no-tobacco material. Mrs. Stella B. Irvine, National W. C. T. U. superintendent of the Sunday School department, suggests that workers supply the Sunday Schools with copies of this number.

Encouragement and Warning

"Comparisons are odious" ordinarily, but when made in a helpful spirit and not in one of criticism, they may be of great value to all parties concerned. At the present time, we are being told by the liquor element, with a great show of plausibility, that prohibition does not prohibit, that it causes crime, and that other dire results come from having foolishly enacted the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act. Consequently, to make things a little better, we must amend the latter to permit the manufacture of drinks of alcoholic percentage up to and including two and three-fourths per cent—ad infinitum.

A short time ago, after having spent several months in Europe and northern Africa, John Gary Evans, former governor of South Carolina, returned to America. In a newspaper interview he said: "I have seen so much of wine drinking and whisky drinking and beer drinking, so few persons who were actually sober, so many evidences of degeneracy brought about by excessive use of alcohol that I feel like commending our country for having taken alcohol in hand before it had gotten a death grip upon our people." As ex-governor Evans had not been especially active in behalf of prohibition before his departure for foreign lands, he cannot be accused of being prejudiced and his remarks take on added significance.

The words just quoted further affirm the statements of those who tell us of the liquor propaganda in various European countries. A prominent English manufacturer, B. Seebohm Rowntree, recently visited the United States and upon his return to his own country was thus reported by the press:

"Our papers are full of the terrible consequence of your prohibition law. We are told of the growing use of drugs, and that an evil greater than that of drink is growing up in this country. We are told of the prisons filled with drunken men and women, and all the rest. Of course, this is rubbish. It was only to be expected that when a tremendous measure such as that came into effect, it would not work smoothly in the first year or two. There is a good deal of infraction and evasion of the law. But on the whole the thing is working with extraordinary success. As I talked with all kinds of employers everywhere in the United States, I found that they are in favor of it and would not go back on any account. I met only two men out of several hundred who held a view contrary to that."

Not only are the British being exhorted in their public press to take warning, but it is said that on the labels of many of the bottles in which drinks are sold are words admonishing them to "preserve their rights in the face of the new American invasion." That the drink interests there realize that now that prohibition is the law in the United States it is bound to spread to other countries unless it is discredited, is shown by the fact that one of the publications published by the trade declares that "the long-threatened drive to make Britain dry has begun in earnest." America's example is bound to accelerate the movement on the other side of the water. It is commented upon by such people as Sir Arthur Newsholme, ex-official of the Local Government Board, who travelled for three years in the United States and says: "The essential point is that the majority of the American population are rapidly losing their appetites for alcoholic drinks, and young people have no opportunity to acquire this appetite. If this be admitted, it must also be agreed that people can be made sober by legislation, and that the temptation to be otherwise can be removed by this means." The conclusion at which Sir Arthur arrives is that "Great Britain will ere long be compelled to travel far in American footsteps, if she is to recover expeditiously from her financial embarrassments and to hold her own in the struggle for national efficiency. No nation liveth to itself. A social example in one country, unless discredited, has world-wide influence. The American experience, in my view, will not be discredited."

The statements of Mr. Herbert Hoare, a real estate man from Australia, concerning prohibition, were freely quoted by the public press during his recent visit in America. Upon his return to Australia he wrote for The Vanguard an account of his impressions of prohibition as he travelled through eleven of our states, from San Francisco to New York. In Chicago, which he had heard was a city where prohibition was exceedingly hard to enforce, he visited on Monday morning one court where thirteen cases of drunkenness were dealt with. The judge told him that the number was at least 75 per cent less since prohibition. Mr. Hoare recalled a Monday morning in Sidney, where 56 men and women were sentenced for drunkenness in sixteen minutes and remembered the central station in Glasgow where from 60 to 80 are ordinarily dealt with. He said he regarded the evidence of the Chicago court as one of the best arguments in favor of prohibition. Like experiences met him in other cities, large and small. He ends his account:

"My three months' stay in America has convinced me that the liquor interests lied to us in Australia in telling us that prohibition was the foe of freedom, and I intend to tell my business friends that prohibition is good for trade: inform manufacturers of its splendid aid to efficiency; say to bankers it has filled the coffers of the exchequer; and say to my church, humanitarian, and other friends that it is a safeguard to the husband, a blessing to the wife, and a God-send to the children.

"I hope that in New Zealand all who are actuated by love of God, home, and every land will, with us in Australia, follow the great lead America has given and devote their energies to wiping out the greatest curse that has ever afflicted the British Empire."

If the more than thirty organizations arrayed against prohibition should miraculously gain their wish, would it not mean, not only that Americans would be discouraged, but, more than that, that other nations would regard as utterly useless a campaign against the liquor traffic? Truly, the last state of this and other countries would be worse than before the temperance folks first started their work.

Jewish Paper Favors Strict Enforcement of Dry Law

"The National Prohibition Law should be strictly enforced by its officers and punctiliously obeyed by the citizens of our country," says Dr. A. Simon in Jewish Times. "One's personal dissatisfaction with a law is no justification for its deliberate violation. Our democracy assumes that every citizen is a potential officer of the law.

"National legislation which cannot in justice be applied to all citizens, irrespective of creeds or class, betrays an inherent weakness. An exemption is a confession of its nation-wide inapplicability. At the same time, it must be vigorously pressed home that an exemption is not a pre-emption of moral obligation. It is rather an insistence on a greater sensitiveness to it. An exemption in national legislation is class legislation. I am not blind to the fact that our Congress cannot pass any law with regard to health, education or marriage which will not elicit a protest from some religious denomination. On the other hand, be it noted that a government regulated by majority cannot justify the persecution of a minority."

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awakening continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

The Aaronic Benediction

Used by the W. C. T. U. at Meetings

The Lord bless thee, and keep thee. The Lord make His face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee. The Lord lift up His countenance upon thee, and give thee peace. Num. 6:24, 25, 26.

"Oh that my tongue might so possess
The secret of his tenderness
That every word I breathed should bless!

"For those who mourn, a word of cheer;
A word of hope to those who fear;
And love to all men, far or near.

"Oh that it might be said of me;
Surely thy speech betrayeth thee
As friend of Christ of Galilee!"

—The Baptist.

Lamps of God

His lamps are we,
To shine where he shall say,
And lamps are not for sunny rooms
Nor for the light of day,
But for dark places of the earth,
Where shame and wrong and crime have birth;
Or of the murky twilight gray,
Where wandering sheep have gone astray;
Or where the light of faith grows dim,
And souls are groping after him;
And as sometimes a flame we find,
Clear shining through the night—
So bright we do not see the lamp,
But only see the light,
So may we shine—his light the flame,
That men may glorify his name.

RED LETTER DAY

April 14—Young People's Branch Day (Birthday of Frances J. Barnes.)

25,000 Children Hungry!

Did you have a good breakfast this morning? And luncheon? An abundant dinner, too, one of the commonplaces of your life, which you accept as a matter of course? Not so with twenty-five thousand children in Armenia. Word has recently been received that because of insufficient funds it is necessary for the Near East Relief to cut its appropriation twenty-five per cent, which means that 25,000 children who have been fed through its ministrations will no longer have anything to eat.

The Near East Relief is preparing little booklets, each representing the life of some child, and desires the women's organizations throughout America to distribute 25,000 copies. The women of the W. C. T. U. have given generously to all relief funds, and are not asked so much to contribute personally, as to aid in getting these books into the hands of friends and fellow-townsmen who can afford and will be willing to save the life of the particular child represented by the book received.

Apply for these books to the nearest Near East Relief representative, and send all money through Mrs. Margaret C. Munns, treasurer of the National W. C. T. U., 1730 Chicago avenue, Evanston, Illinois.

Russia Calls to Us

Lella M. Sewall, National Superintendent Flower Mission and Relief Work

The department of Flower Mission and Relief Work has already demonstrated its readiness and ability for relief work in our own land and in lands across the sea. The conditions in Russia, under the Soviet Government, are deplorable, even tragic. Official reports definitely state that 15,000,000 people are dying of starvation in Russia. Clothing, too, is greatly needed. What can we do for the unfortunate people in this stricken country?

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union has shown itself the friend of all in distress and need, and surely will not fail to hear this urgent, piercing cry from the peasants of Russia. The American Friends Service Committee, 20 South Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, stands ready to receive money and clothing for these people. Let individuals and local unions make special efforts to promote this noble cause, sending all contributions of money to the national treasurer, Mrs. Margaret C. Munns, Evanston, Illinois, and all clothing to the American Friends Store Room, care Elizabeth Marot, 15th and Cherry Streets, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. Remember the motto of this department, "Bear ye one another's burdens and so fulfill the law of Christ."

Governor Leads the Way

Helen G. H. Estelle, National Superintendent Anti-Narcotics

Do you know that there is a town in the United States in which no cigars, cigarets or tobacco, in any form, are allowed to be sold? Yes, it is true. Snowflake, Arizona is the place. The Tobacco Leaf, in commenting on the fact, states that a South Bend, Indiana, manufacturer circularized the town for orders and from every source came the information that tobacco products were ruled out.

Governor Thomas McRae of Arkansas has sought to protect the youth of his state by proclaiming March 17 as "NO TOBACCO DAY." In his call he asks that those who believe that tobacco is harmful take the lead in signalizing the day, to the end that our public schools and colleges may be induced to take notice of the necessity for a campaign of education and precaution against the use of tobacco.

For forty years the Woman's Christian Temperance Union has been engaged in just such a campaign. Through the Scientific Temperance Instruction department, we have been teaching teachers and scholars that the nicotine in tobacco is a poison. Through our Loyal Temperance Legion and Young People's Branch we have enlisted young people that they might have a part in the educational work which the governor of Arkansas desires to accomplish.

We believe with the governor that the general use of tobacco by men and women, generation after generation, is contributing to unmistakable and certain degeneracy, to say nothing of the disagreeable features of the habit and its great expense to mankind.

Every state has a law regulating the sale of tobacco to those under age. Many states are observing a Law Posting Day when an effort is made to place a copy of the state law in the hands of every dealer in tobacco products.

Maryland observed March 20 as Law Posting Day.

Illinois will place the law on April 20.

Trio of Pioneer White Ribboners Called to Their Reward

Ella Beecher Gittings

In the passing on to the heavenly life of Mrs. Louisa A'hmuty Nash of Nashville, February 16, Mrs. Mary D. Russell of Eugene, February 21, and Mrs. Helen D. Harford of Portland, February 28, Oregon W. C. T. U. was bereft, in less than a fortnight, of three most valued pioneer workers.

Mrs. Nash in her young womanhood, before making America her home, was a member of the British Women's Temperance Association. Upon coming to Oregon she became prominent in temperance affairs and served several years as state Press superintendent and UNION SIGNAL correspondent. Her prose and verse were nationally known and appreciated. She was buried from the Episcopal Church in Corvallis, February 18.

Mrs. Russell was Nebraska's corresponding secretary before coming to Oregon. Here she held the same state office for several years. Until a short time before her passing, when ill health compelled her to surrender active work, she occupied many important positions of trust, state and local, and was much beloved by her co-workers. Services were held at Eugene and at Portland, her former home, where interment took place.

Mrs. Harford had almost completed her four score years and until a very few days before she was stricken, was so alert physically and mentally, (answering many calls for addresses and counsel) that her passing came as a distinct shock to her many friends. For about thirty years she had served Oregon W. C. T. U. as lecturer organizer, and campaign worker, and had led the temperance forces four years as state president. Later, as national lecturer and organizer, she endeared herself to the women of many other states, whose campaigns she so ably assisted. Hers was a beautiful white ribbon funeral. The services were conducted by Rev. Alice Handsaker, pastor of the Arleta Congregational Church and also a W. C. T. U. member, Mrs. Mary Mallett state president of Oregon, and Mrs. M Frances Swope, former state president Honorary pall bearers, dressed in white from the Arleta union of which Mrs. Harford was a member, dropped flowers in the casket, reciting as they did so appropriate scripture texts. The burial service at the grave was read by the pastor of Arleta M. E Church, of which she was a member.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

News From the Field

Mrs. Fannie Drummond has just finished a most successful two months of work in Michigan and in Indiana. In Indiana she secured 59 members for the W. C. T. U. and 1061 pledges for the Y. P. B. In Michigan her record was 66 W. C. T. U. members, 307 Y. P. B. pledges and 50 L. T. L. pledges. In the Wabash high school, in less than half an hour, 267 students signed our triple pledge. In Marion, Indiana, this record was exceeded by more than one hundred.

Miss Ethel Love, president of the Y. P. B. federation of Massachusetts, has been appointed superintendent of Citizenship for the Boston Christian Endeavor Union. The Massachusetts Y. P. B. has sent $100 to place the name of a worker in the Jubilee Book of Remembrance. A new Italian Y. P. B. and an Italian L. T. L. have been organized by the Y. P. B.

Miss Winona Jewell is busy in Colorado, where she is doing general W. C. T. U. work as well as organizing Y. P. B.'s.

Miss Dorothy Wheale strengthened the work in Rhode Island. The greater part of the month of February she gave to New York. In March, she went to Delaware, and will be in South Carolina for the month of April.

Our Three World Prohibition Documents

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union has always looked upon the whole world as its parish, and each of the three presidents of the National W. C. T. U. has issued a proclamation for World Prohibition.

To Frances E. Willard, sitting in her study at Rest Cottage, came the inspiration to write the Polyglot Petition, addressed to all rulers and nations of the world, in an appeal for world prohibition, world purity, and freedom from the opium trade. This petition was the cry of the womanhood of the world that the legalization of sin in any form might be abolished.

Amid the smoke of the great battle for the retention of prohibition in the state of Maine in 1911, there came to Lillian M. N. Stevens the vision of a day when not only the United States but all the world should be emancipated from the liquor traffic, and she issued the following statesmanlike proclamation:

"In the name of the World's and National W. C. T. U., we hereby make this proclamation for a great crusade to carry the vital truth to the people themselves in all lands, and through them to place prohibition in the organic law of all nations and ultimately in the organic law of the world, and to this high end we invoke the blessing and guidance of Almighty God and the co-operation of the men and women of all lands who love their fellow men."

On November 11, 1918, the day of the close of the great World War, Anna Adams Gordon, president of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, issued this proclamation:

"World democracy, world peace, world purity and world patriotism, demand world prohibition.

"Representing the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the United States, a Republic about to write prohibition in its constitutional law, we hereby call upon the peoples of all faiths and all organizations in the world's family of nations, to clasp hands with the World's W. C. T. U. and to help bring to full fruition its hope and its heroic service of thirty-five years on behalf of a sober world. Science declares against alcohol. Health, conservation and business prosperity demand total abstinence and prohibition. Together let us agitate, educate, organize and legislate, until the exalted vision of the founder of the World's W. C. T. U., Frances E. Willard, is realized; until the Gospel of the Golden Rule of Christ is worked out in the customs of society and in the laws of every land.

"At the close of the devastating world war, in the white heat of the limitless unparalleled opportunities of a new internationalism, depending upon the help of God and of all who love humanity we hereby proclaim, by the year 1925, the triumph of world prohibition."

Preparing the Way For the Polyglot Petition

Before starting the campaign to secure signatures to the Polyglot Petition in your community, it will be desirable to give the movement publicity through the local press. Visit the editors of your city newspapers and ask them to give space for an article about the petition, which you will furnish, (for material see THE UNION SIGNAL of last week).

Interest the leaders of the Christian Endeavor Societies and Epworth League, and ask the privilege of a five or ten minute talk on the history and purpose of the petition at one of the regular Sunday evening meetings. Have several Y. P. B. members with petitions to present to the young people at the close of the meeting.

Secure co-operation of the teachers of the Bible classes of all the Sunday Schools, and ask someone in each class to present the petition and get signatures.

Please "Paws" a Moment!

Mrs. Myra Miller-Stauffer, National Promoter Anna A. Gordon Missionary Fund

Talk about it! Talk about it!! Talk about it!!! About what? About our Anna A. Gordon Missionary Fund! Yes, that's what we must do! Talk about our Anna A. Gordon Missionary Fund,—as a stepping stone to greater contributions for it!

How many boys or girls like to wear a badge, or a special button? Let me tell you about a button which I wish every one of you would wear! It has a blue background with those three short words, in white, on it: "Talk About It." Immediately, every one will ask "About what?" Then is your chance to reply, "About our Anna A. Gordon Missionary Fund," and promptly proceed to stir up an interest in our wonderful fund! Do you want to wear a "Talk About It" button? If you do, interest your local Loyal Temperance Legion leader or the local W. C. T. U., to send for them to William H. Dietz, 20 East Randolph St., Chicago, Illinois. Price, 25 cents per dozen; $2.00 per 100. They will prove to be real "winners"!

How many of you have ever had a mite box in which to gather for a good cause pennies, nickels, dimes and quarters? Let us adopt the mite box plan for our L. T. L., that we may gather a great sum for the Anna A. Gordon Missionary Fund in 1922!

I found an excellent, inexpensive mite box, which will answer our purpose splendidly. Send to the same publisher who handles the "Talk About It" buttons for the "Dietz Security Mite Box, No. 2," a collapsible, self-sealing cardboard box, which can be mailed flat in an envelope, with instructions, to any address. Price, 100 boxes, $3.50 prepaid. Sample box from William H. Dietz, free, for the asking.

A clever idea was exploited in the Palm Branch of the Methodist Church, Canada. One of the mite box secretaries got some sandpaper and made teddy bears—cut them out, and pasted them on colored cardboard (red would be pretty, as it is one of our L. T. L. colors), on which were these words:

"Please 'paws' a moment and 'bear' in mind that you have a mite box.

"Don't be 'rough' with it, but 'strike' in all the money you can, and make it a 'match' for any box in the land."

These were given with every mite box, so that wherever there was one, a sand paper teddy bear stood guard.

Shall we adopt this happy idea?

"Yes, indeed," I hear you reply in merry chorus!

All right then, let us rush off our orders for the "Talk About It" buttons, and the mite boxes; then let us make sandpaper teddy bears, with that suggestive inscription, and begin, without delay, to "talk about" the Anna A. Gordon Missionary Fund, and have your friends and neighbors "paws" a moment and "bear" in mind that you have an L. T. L. mite box, to gather contributions for the Anna A. Gordon Missionary Fund.

Will your state lead in these plans?

Will your legion "strike" in the most money?

Will you make your box a "match" for any box in the whole United States?

It would be very refreshing to your national promoter to get a postal-card from legion leaders and members saying that you "bear" in mind these suggestions! I shall look for an "April shower" of cards! Please don't disappoint me!

Besides talking about it, let us sing about it! Here is a new song which Mrs. Margaret Hornberger Lutz, of Denver, Pennsylvania, and your national promoter, worked out for you. (The chorus used in it is an old missionary chorus, author unknown.)

FREE THE WORLD!

Tune: "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp!"

In the work we have in view
For the children of the world,
There is much that every one of us can do!
Let our banner be unfurled,
While we work for truth and right,
Through our Anna Gordon Missionary Fund!

Chorus:

"Jesus loves the little children!
He has told us in His Word!
Black or yellow, brown or white,
Makes no difference in His sight,
Jesus loves the little children of the world!"

We are sending messengers
To the youth in other lands,
With the Anna Gordon Missionary Fund!
So we'll use our minds and hands,
Give our nickels and our dimes,
Free the great old world from alcoholic bonds!

Memorize this song; sing it in your home, on your way to school, at your L. T. L. meetings, as a part of your public programs, and at your social meetings!

"Talk about it!"

Sing about it!!

Fill your mite box for it!!!"

"Rally today! Let us answer the call;
Dare we stand idle—dare we to shirk?
Come, for the Master has need of us all,
Up and away to the Lord's waiting work!"

NATIONAL W. C. T. U. PUBLISHING HOUSE Evanston, Illinois

Preparing For the "Come-Back" Staged by the Wets

Hessie W. Leybourn

The mid-year executive meeting and state educational conference of the Ohio W. C. T. U., held in Columbus, March 1-3, was most helpful and inspiring.

The opening session was in charge of the state Loyal Temperance Legion and Young People's Branch secretaries and the program included a debate on the question, "Resolved that every W. C. T. U., if it is so determined, CAN mobilize the children for a Loyal Temperance Legion." After hearing from ten "Can'ts" and the same number of "Cans," the audience voted unanimously in favor of the "Cans". Miss Mary B. Ervin, national L. T. L. secretary, spoke briefly of the work among the children. Two playlets were given by the Columbus Y. P. B.'s—"Good Citizenship" and "The Eighteenth Amendment Forever."

"Praise the Lord and Keep Busy" Slogan of Ohio Executive Committee Meeting and Conference

Our state president, Mrs. Florence D. Richard, gave us this slogan for the year: "Praise the Lord and keep busy!" As Ohio is to be the first battleground for the "come-back" of beer and wine this year, she urged the women to greater vigilance in warring against the wets. Valuable facts and data are to be printed in leaflet form for liberal use.

Mr. James A. White, superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League, gave a most helpful address on "Constitutional Loyalty." The thirty wet organizations all have the same object, he said—not to change the Constitution, or the Eighteenth Amendment, but to nullify them. Mr. White's little son, Tommy, also delighted the audience with a speech.

There is in the state treasury over $600,000, received as fines for the violation of the prohibitory law.

The state treasurer, Mrs. Frances Ensign Fuller, and corresponding secretary, Mrs. H. D. Van Kirk, gave excellent reports, showing the work in Ohio to be in very fine shape. "Victory Day" was generally observed throughout the state, and an offering sent to the state treasurer. This fund is to be used for organization work.

Mrs. Sara K. Meredith, recording secretary and state superintendent of Peace and International Arbitration, spoke on "Shall We End War?" She said, "A ten-year holiday from war means a ten-year work day for peace," and asserted that only during the time of peace can we work successfully for peace. Education is the best way to achieve results. It is the ignorance of the people that makes war possible. She urged that more attention be given to Bible study and said we could well spend a year in studying the Sermon on the Mount.

The speakers for the second evening were Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger, national director of the Americanization department, and Hon. Don Parker, state prohibition officer. Mrs. Vayhinger said, "There is a long campaign of education before us. Education is just as necessary as it was before prohibition was written into the Constitution. We will maintain and enforce the law in the same way that we got it."

Mr. Parker said, "It's up to us to stand back of the officers—but not too far back—so we can pat them on the back when they do right, and prod them when they don't."

The educational conference followed the executive committee meeting. In the keynote address Mrs. Richard said, "We are to stress two things in Ohio this year—increased membership and law enforcement. We are going to double our enrollment, possibly treble it."

Needed: Grit, Grace, and Gumption

We were greatly privileged to have with us two representatives of the National W. C. T. U., Mrs. Frances P. Parks, national corresponding secretary, and Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger, national director of Americanization, both of whom brought us helpful thoughts and suggestions. Mrs. Parks spoke on "The Membership Campaign." She explained the trio team plan and declared we need grace, grit and gumption. She said: "What would it mean if each individual in the organization should gain three new members this year?" She urged the use of the window cards in every home possible. Mrs. Parks also spoke on "The Jubilee—Using the Money," and Mrs. Vayhinger on "Americanization Plans."

Mr. Cookson, superintendent of the Columbus schools, was introduced and made a short speech. He paid a tribute to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and said he always takes off his hat whenever he meets a woman wearing the white ribbon. He made application of the story of a colored mammy he once saw in her garden. He stopped and said to her, "That's a fine garden." She replied, "Well, it ought to be. I live here."

The meeting was one of the finest ever held in Ohio. One of our women said she had been attending our state meetings since 1887, but this was the very best in our history.

We spent a few days in Columbus after the conference closed and had the pleasure of attending a meeting of Central union, the largest in the city. It was an all day occasion with a pot luck dinner at noon. The women were busy making a layette as a part of their child welfare work. A number of guests were present, including our state president, several state superintendents and local presidents. Mrs. Bee, formerly of Oklahoma, but now doing house-to-house work in Columbus, was also a very welcome guest. The meeting was in charge of Mrs. Connell, president of Central union and of Franklin county.

Mrs. Richard spoke about the "come back" the wets are staging here in Ohio. Their slogan is "Ohio First," for they believe that as votes Ohio so will the other states vote. In closing, she asked every one to pledge with her to "see this thing THROUGH!"

Educators Advocate Motion Pictures

Ruth M. Whitfield, Department of English, New Trier High School, Kenilworth, Ill.

The use of motion pictures in schools and churches is now being endorsed throughout the country as an educational expedient. Rev. Dan B. Brummitt, editor of the Epworth Herald, recently advised his readers, "Use the movies for education, recreation, and evangelization in the church, instead of abusing them." Another instance of endorsement is Dr. Herman Adler's significant statement that there had never come under his observation in his service with the Juvenile Court a case of juvenile delinquency that was caused by motion pictures. Even so-called higher education is putting the stamp of approval upon the motion picture, for the Yale University Press is spending a large sum of money in making one hundred authentic reels of history called, "Chronicles of America."

Some of the foremost educators in the country have become so actively interested in the visual education movement that they have launched an organization founded upon the high ideal of providing the best motion pictures in the educational field. This organization is the Society for Visual Education Inc., Chicago. Films have been made on the subjects most important for preparing the children of today to become useful citizens of tomorrow—American History, Geography, Citizenship, and Health and Sanitation. All of these subjects are treated as systematically as books are written.

There is no doubt about it that the present day film, if properly directed, is a splendid vehicle of education, because most of our knowledge comes through our eyes. Pictures and illustrations of all kinds have always been in favor as a means of visual education. Then how much more effective is the life and movement of motion pictures to hold the attention of the children. The pupils absorb the meaning of what they see while they might get exceedingly little out of a book or discussion, because of lack of active attention on their part. The vividness of impression is important. What seems to be real and life-like will be remembered longer, because it is more convincing.

Moving pictures provide the best conditions for viewing material. All of the children can see everything on the screen, whereas they might see little as they crowd around the teacher's desk or bulletin board, or are distracted by some disorder in the room. More material can be shown in a film than can be placed before the children; for instance, the whole life process which takes an entire season to secure can be run off in succession in a reel or two.

For use in the schools, the moving picture does not, in any sense, displace the text-book nor the teacher. It supplements them and makes them more valuable. It helps the pupils to learn their lessons better, rather than makes the lessons easier. Motion pictures are not for amusement, but for serious work, just as laboratories, and shops, and domestic science equipment are for serious work.

"SAFEGUARDING THE NATION," a five-reel motion picture showing the effects of alcohol upon the body by means of the laboratory process, is a picture such as educators advocate.

The Enemy

Frances S. Hallowes

(The S. S. "Persia" is bound for India, having among its passengers Major Orde and Bertram Harford, who have become acquainted with a Mrs. Carlyle, her small son, Eric, and Angela O'Connor, who, in the charge of Mrs. Carlyle, is on her way to marry a Deputy Commissioner at Seraneb. Harford, who is a total abstainer, is glad to note that Angela refuses to drink, and the two become good friends. Consequently, Harford is much shocked to learn that Angela has been induced by Mrs. Carlyle to take some whisky for seasickness and has been overcome by the liquor. Through pity for her he breaks his reticence on the subject, and tells her that both his parents were victims of drink, and that he had promised his mother on her deathbed never to touch alcohol in any form. Angela admits that she has made her mother a similar promise, but does not mention any particular reason therefor. One night, while his mother is at a bridge party, tiny Eric helps himself to her whisky, left out on the table in their cabin, and quickly becomes unconscious. He is discovered and cared for, but dies during the night and is buried at sea. At Bombay Angela is met by her fiance, Frank Fortescue, and after the wedding ceremony the couple set out for their new home.)

CHAPTER VII.

Railway travelling in India is no light matter; the amount of luggage necessary would amaze those who think that one trunk and a handbag should suffice for a reasonable being. First of all you must have your bedding, for journeys are generally of one and often of two or three nights' duration. People carry their beds with them wherever they go; even the native walks about with his, which is merely a square of cotton counterpane or a brown blanket. But the Englishman has his mattress, pillows, blankets and coverlet, if not sheets.

Then there is the tiffin basket with teapot, cups, plates, spoons, biscuits, soda-water, all necessary on a long journey. Clothes for hot days, others for cold nights and mornings, a pocket camera, a pith helmet and sundry books, papers and packages complete the kit which the Sahib and the Mem-Sahib require.

The Fortescues had a large first-class carriage reserved for their long journey, and disposed their impedimenta without difficulty.

Angela was in the mind to admire everything, and even on the hot days when the sun beat through the shutters and the dust was choking, travelling was not a hardship to her. At every station she was greatly interested in the sights and sounds provided by the gaily-decked Indians, who rush and shout like children whenever the train draws to a standstill. The people of India take very kindly to railway travelling; they seem to find it an exhilarating recreation, though they spend their all—perhaps have saved up their spare cash for weeks—to be able to enjoy a trip in what is but a slightly superior cattle truck, where they are packed closer than animals would be.

Angela was much amused by the talking, shrieking, gesticulating, arguing crowds. She asked many questions as to the meaning of a cage-like enclosure where natives sat on the ground patiently waiting, in closely packed rows. She was told that time being of no great value in India, the people are good at waiting. It is their favorite recreation. The railway station is a very agreeable place where there is plenty to observe, so the passengers prefer to arrive hours before the time fixed for departure, and are content to wait behind the barrier, sitting on their heels, till the train comes in. It is difficult for the travelling peasant to grasp the time-table. He imagines that trains start at some uncertain moment, perhaps due to the caprice of the engine-driver; and as to fares, he seems to think that by patient bargaining with the ticket clerk he may get a reduction on the official rate.

The different costumes worn by various classes aroused Angela's mirth. The fat Hindu merchant, in a coat of dressing-gown shape, made of flowered silk, with light, thin trousers buttoned at the ankles, his head swathed in a prodigious red shawl; the brown-legged coolie, with the minimum of decent clothing; the hybrid baboo, with draped, bare legs, English boots and socks, and English-cut coat and fine muslin turban, were types of men quite new to her. And the women—some draped over head and face, with bare feet adorned with clanking anklets, dangling baby on hip, or dragging a child; others carried in a dhoolie, a cage-like structure hung on a pole, from which they are transported with care to the railway carriage, lest any exposure of face or form should violate their "purdah." She saw with interest the food offered on sale to these travellers; chupatties, smeary, sticky sweet-meats, and bits of sugar-cane; while for drink, water provided by the "bheestie" (water-carrier) was received by the passengers in their brown brass pots. She felt at the end of her journey that she had learned a good deal of the customs of India.

The long, hot dusty journey across India was at an end. Angela and her husband stepped on to the platform at Seraneb with a sigh of relief.

They were immediately surrounded by what seemed to Angela a little crowd of native servants. Two tall Indians, in red and gold livery, and another in pure white with a high folded white turban, crossed by a dark band, bearing a silver badge, stood with their hands to their foreheads and the words, "Salaam, Mem Sahib" fell upon her ear.

She laughed gleefully. "My first welcome, Frank! What fine fellows!"

"Ah, yes! my servants are always well behaved. Here, you bearer," to the man in white; "look after our luggage; here's our ticket, and you, syce, take these bags to the carriage. Now then, we'll be off at once."

At the door of the station stood a beautiful little victoria with a fine pair of bay horses.

"Why, this is just like an English carriage. I expected something more Oriental," said Angela.

"Silly little woman, it is the best carriage in the station!"

The red and gold grooms leapt up behind and each unfurled a white umbrella, which they held over the heads of their master and mistress.

"Ah! this is a little more Eastern; I am used to holding my own sunshade," said Angela.

"This is a better custom. We don't do anything in India that we can get done for us." They rolled rapidly down the wide road leading from the railway station.

"Is our house near the native city?"

"No, two miles away; we live in cantonments."

"Cantonments! what is that?"

"The district devoted to the military. It is laid out, kept in order and ruled by Army men. You will see plenty of soldiers, little woman, and no doubt you will have a train of admiring subs."

"Subs! What are subs?"

"Innocent! Young officers—very young and very impecunious. Glad to know a Mem Sahib who can give them plenty of whisky and cigarets."

"Well, they won't get whisky out of me."

"Don't be too sure, madam!"

"Are there many English ladies?"

"A few; we have a good little club, and lots of fun going on from now to March."

"I was told English people knew how to amuse themselves in India."

"You will like it—I prophesy you will rule the roost. All the station is on tiptoe to see my wife."

Fortescue laid stress on the "my" with such an air of conviction of the superiority of his belongings, that Angela laughed and asked,

"Are you an important person in this place?"

"Why, don't you know I am Deputy Commissioner?"

"Yes, but I don't know how much that means."

"Well, I'm second in the Civil Station. Some day you will be the Burri Mem Sahib. Ah! wait until you know a little more of life in India."

They drove into a large compound or garden, in which stood a spacious looking bungalow, which was painted a pale shrimp pink picked out with white lines.

"Oh, what a pretty pink house!"

"Welcome home, little wife!" Fortescue clasped Angela's hand, and looked into her lovely face, which was flushed with the excitement of her home-coming.

Her eyes roved over everything approvingly. The compound was well laid out. A garden in beautiful order, evidenced great care in a climate where water is very scarce except in the rainy season of three months.

The grass lawn was the first turf seen by Angela since she landed. This was intersected by beds of seedlings on their way to maturity; sweet peas, about a foot high, gave promise of becoming a thick hedge. A rosery skirted the lawn, and many fine and unknown plants and trees were grouped at intervals.

The drive swept round the garden, and the carriage came to a standstill before a wide pillared portico or stone verandah, up to which a flight of low broad stone steps led. The steps were gay with a cascade of chrysanthemums, phlox, ferns and palms in pots.

A row of white clothed servants stood salaaming. One, an important looking person, with a black, waving beard and a prodigious turban, advanced with a deep reverence.

"Hulloa, Divan Singh, here is the Mem Sahiba. This is my factotum," Fortescue explained turning to Angela.

"He looks very imposing!"

"He is a simple-hearted creature, in spite of his imposing exterior, and as faithful as servants are made."

Angela regarded Divan Singh with interest, and gave him one of her bewitching smiles. Divan's susceptible heart was taken by storm. From that moment he was devoted to his mistress.

"Put on your prettiest dress, but no jewelry, little woman," said Fortescue, putting his head into her dressing-room four hours later.

Angela had slept for three hours, glad to be on a steady, quiet bed once more. She was surrounded by her trunks.

Her Ayah, a slender, middle-aged woman, dressed in scarlet jacket and white "chadar," and bedizened with much silver jewelry on head, neck, arms, nose, ears, ankles and toes—was on her knees unpacking, and trying to understand Angela's English. Fortescue had hired her on recommendation of speaking English. She certainly knew a few common sentences, and being a bright woman, managed to comprehend something of what she did not know.

Angela chattered on to her.

"Yes, take that dress out carefully. Is it not a lovely one? My mother designed it," as a fairy-like lace dress draped over rose-pink chiffon emerged from its soft paper wrappings.

"Ah, Mem Sahiba, Khubsurat hai!" *

"I don't know what you mean, Ayah, but make haste; there is not much time to dress."

The Ayah clanked hither and thither, her silver ornaments jingling as she moved.

"Dear me, Ayah, what a clatter. Why do servants wear such things?"

In her turn, Ayah did not understand what a "clatter" was.

Angela stood clothed in the rose-pink creation. Its filmy folds flowed gracefully round her. She looked very different from the travel-stained little lady who had arrived so recently.

She glanced at herself with satisfaction.

"I think he will like this," she said to herself.

There were no long stairs to descend. She had only to sweep from her room into the drawing-room. It was lit by large standard lamps. A soft glow filled the lofty-pillared, spacious room. Gorgeous embroideries, carved screens, brass and silver, and soft rugs made a rich and harmonious whole.

As she entered, her husband, who stood at a table under a lamp, from which light rayed down upon several morocco jewelry boxes, came quickly to her. Holding her at arm's length, he scanned every detail of her dress: then with a smile of satisfaction:

"My wife is the handsomest woman in the Station, and I am going to make her still more bewitching. Look here!"

As he spoke, he took from the boxes before him a dazzling necklace of diamonds and pearls, with a brooch, bracelet, and star for the hair.

"Oh, Frank, how lovely! For me? How perfectly sweet of you to give me just what I like. I am so glad they are pearls and not colored stones."

"They suit your beauty, don't they, little woman?" and he proceeded to deck her in the ornaments.

Then he led her to one of the mirrors, and with his arm around her, said with a smile, "Let me introduce you to the handsomest and best dressed woman in India—Mrs. Fortescue."

She laughed gleefully, and clasped his arm fondly.

"Thank you, dear, a thousand times; I never dreamt of having such costly jewels."

"My wife must always have the best," he replied.

He led her into the dining-room, where a round table was laid for two, and decked with exquisite flowers, silver and glass.

Fortescue was a man to whom the pleasures of the table appealed.

"Our first dinner together as man and wife."

"What a delightful room!" said Angela. "I thought poor bachelors in India lived in a very bare and uncomfortable way."

"In fact, in hugger-mugger style, eh!"

"Yes, in something of that sort."

"Well, you see, we know how to take care of ourselves, and our boys here," indicating the white-robed servants moving noiselessly about on bare feet, "pick up our ideas and keep us going in style. I always dine like this, and keep up state. Government officers, my dear, you see! It is demanded of us."

"You hardly needed a wife."

"Well, you see, I always meant to have one as soon as I could afford that luxury, and now I can keep you, my beauty, in style."

"But I want, not to be a luxury, but a helpmeet to you, to look after your house and make you comfortable."

"My dear child, you shall be the ornament of my house and of Seraneb society. I shall be quite satisfied if you adorn my position and advance my interests in the hostess line. Divan Singh, where is that champagne? Fill Mem Sahiba's glass."

Divan Singh advanced with a bottle to Angela's side.

"No, no!" she exclaimed, hastily, "I don't like wine," covering the glass with her hand.

Her husband stared a moment.

"Nonsense, Angela! remove your hand. Here, Divan, fill Mem Sahiba's glass."

She looked at him with distress in her eyes.

"Oh, Frank, please excuse me."

"No, indeed! What! your first home-coming? You refuse to drink my health! Come now, this is a very special and expensive champagne, try it."

"But, Frank, I promised Mother not to take it."

Angela's thought was also with Harford and his request to her, but she had the tact not to speak of him.

Before And After Taking The "Trio Team Tonic"

Della F. Withers, Circulation Manager

The Hardscrabble W. C. T. U. was a regularly organized union with president, secretary and treasurer. On certain dates meetings were held, and all members wore the white ribbon bow when going on a visit or dressed for a special occasion. There must have been at least twenty members in the union. If the weather was pleasant, they came to the meetings, and talked about how terrible it was that the prohibitory law was not enforced. Not many people in the town knew there was a W. C. T. U. The pastors would have welcomed the aid of the white ribboners to help them in their work for humanity. The local newspapers would have been glad to give space to the "real news about prohibition" had it been furnished them. In fact the diagnosis of the Hardscrabble W. C. T. U. read something like this: "The patient is suffering from anaemia; her vitality is low; her heart action is sluggish; she is apt to look on the dark side of things; is given to much worry; irritable and easily discouraged."

One day the president of the union received a letter from the state representatives of the national offical papers, recommending a remedy for this unsatisfactory condition. The "Trio-Team Tonic" she called it. She told of its miraculous effect on many patients. The need was apparent, so a trial package was ordered.

Shortly after taking the remedy, a change for the better was to be observed in the patient. It was noticed that the officers began to take pride in their leadership of the W. C. T. U. and in every way to be very active. Very soon an order for the "Trio-Team Tonic" to be sent regularly each week was received by the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House and promptly filled. It continued to work like magic. Pastors were supplied with helpful information, the local papers were furnished weekly with a column of prohibition's benefits, and the city became aware that there was a W. C. T. U. and that it was very much alive. Apathetic members of the union, seeing the beneficial effects on the officers, decided to try the remedy, and as a result felt new ambition. The union thrived and grew, and made itself an influential, respected and loved organization in the community.

We heartily recommend "Trio-Team Tonic" (a subscription to the weekly UNION SIGNAL for one year for president, secretary and treasurer). Where, for $1.50, can you purchase such a producer of energy?

They All Know

From the Patriot (South Australia) comes the following interesting item:

"A prohibition enthusiast in South Australia, finding a certain publican marooned a big distance from home, gave him a lift in his motor car.

"The enthusiast improved the shining hour by confessing his faith in prohibition, and then added: 'As prohibition is sure to come, I should advise you to get out of your pub as soon as you can.' The publican replied: 'Yes, I know it's coming, and you know it's coming; but the trouble is, the other man knows it's coming, and he won't buy my business!'"

"The great danger to the country as a result of more and more Germans, especially workmen, becoming teetotalers," was discussed at a special meeting of the brewers' association of Germany, according to a socialist paper, which alleges that the beer makers are planning a campaign against abstainers.

The only position for those who favor respect for law to take is that those charged with law enforcement must enforce all the laws, and all good citizens must obey all the laws; neither can exercise any right of choice in this matter without placing themselves above the law. It is the part of faithful officials to enforce and the part of good citizens to obey them.

HOUSE MAKES UNUSUAL RECORD—SENATE RATIFIES FOUR-POWER PACT—MACHINE TO PREVENT PERMIT FORGERY—BONUS PASSES HOUSE—POSTPONE PAYMENT OF AUSTRIAN DEBT—RHINE TROOPS HOME JULY FIRST—PROHIBITION DISTRICTS DESIGNATED

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

House of Representatives Makes Unusual Record in Progress of its Legislation

The House has made a remarkable record in its dispatch of business since the beginning of the regular session of the Sixty-seventh Congress. After reorganizing its Committee on Appropriations and adopting a new system of classification as to supply bills, the House with unusual zest, devoted its energies to the task of reducing appropriations. If mistakes have been made, they have been in the direction of too much economy rather than too little.

The total number of regular appropriation bills is eleven, and nine of these have been reported to the House. Two have been completed by both House and Senate and sent to the White House. Four are in conference and one is pending in the House. Only two of the total number, the Naval, and State and Justice Department bills, are yet to be reported by the House committee. In addition to the regular bills, two deficiency bills have been passed.

Two years ago only seven of the total number of appropriation bills had by the middle of March been advanced through the House. The new system under the budget has been justified by results at least for dispatch of business.

Senate Ratifies Pacific Treaty, First Arms Parley Pact

The Senate Friday afternoon by a vote of 67 to 27, which was four more than the necessary two-thirds, ratified the Four-Power Treaty with the Brandegee reservations.

The following is the vote:

Republicans Against: Borah of Idaho; France of Maryland; Johnson of California; La Follette of Wisconsin—4.

Jones (Democrat) of New Mexico and Crow of Pennsylvania (Republican), who could not be paired, would have voted for the Treaty had they been present.

Prior to the final vote there were 30 roll calls on various amendments and reservations, the high-water mark of the opposition being recorded as 36 votes.

The Committee reservation incorporates in the treaty this language:

"The United States understands that under the statement in this preamble, or under the terms of this treaty, there is no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no obligation to join in any defense."

Supplemental Treaty Next

It is expected that the Senate will vote next on the Supplemental Treaty, which excludes from the operation of the Four-power Pact the homeland of Japan.

Next will come the Naval Limitation Treaty and Submarine and Poison Gas Warfare Treaties. It had been planned originally to take up the Chinese Customs Duty Treaty after disposal of the Four-Power Treaty and Supplement, because of the desire to bring about an early appointment of the members of the International Commission, provided for in the treaty.

Machine Device to Prevent Forgery of Liquor Withdrawal Permits

The government has adopted means of protection against forgeries and alterations of liquor withdrawal permits that are expected to prevent liquor frauds by juggling of permits. For many months these swindlers have been as much of an annoyance to Federal prohibition enforcement agents as check swindlers have for years been to banks and depositors. The solution of the problem of blocking license forgeries has been found in the employment of special permit-writing machines.

These machines, while ingenious and thoroughly efficient are small and simple in operation. They resemble a check protector made by the same manufacturer, and employ the most modern protective principles of the safest possible check writer. The company making these devices for the government has guaranteed not to manufacture any other machine of exactly the same type.

Soldier Bonus Bill Passes House

The $4,000,000,000 soldier bonus bill passed the House by a vote of 333 to 70, or 64 more than the two-thirds majority necessary for passage.

The provisions of this bill will be given next week.

Time of Austrian Debt Extended Twenty-five Years

The Senate has unanimously passed a resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to postpone for a period not to exceed twenty-five years payment of principal and interest of Austria's debt for flour purchased from the United States Grain Corporation, and to release, in whole or in part, as his judgment may dictate, Austria's assets pledged for payment. The authorization is conditional upon similar action by "substantially all other" nations to which Austria is in debt.

Substantially all of these nations have declared their willingness to take such action should the United States do so. There should be bonfires in Vienna. The Austrian debt to us is $24,000,000. It was secured by a lien on Austrian state assets and revenues; the latter may now be used for securing a new loan.

All Rhine Troops Home by July 1

Orders directing the return to the United States by July 1 of all American troops now on the Rhine have been issued by Secretary Weeks.

The order includes the return by the end of the fiscal year of the entire force of approximately 2,000 men excepted from the previous order of several weeks ago, under which the homeward movement of the majority of the American Rhine contingent is now in progress.

Prohibition Unit Divides the Country Into Eighteen Districts

Commissioner Haynes has announced that the country has been divided into eighteen districts as the field of prohibition agents.

"Each of the divisions," Mr. Haynes said, "will be in charge of a chief who will be under direct control of the prohibition commissioner, acting through Mr. Yellowley. By April 1 it is expected there will have been a complete realocation of the general agents' forces in accordance with the new plan.

"The force of general prohibition agents, under the direction of division chiefs, will not in any manner be a part of the forces working under the supervision of Federal prohibition director but will be a separate and distinct organization wholly under the control the prohibition commissioner.

"Of course it is understood that the purpose is that the work of these men shall supplement the work of the field forces, operating under the direction the state directors, and will be a very great aid to the respective directors.

"Also one of the chief objects of the newly announced plan is to secure the largest possible measure of economy the operation of this force. It will very materially reduce traveling and other expenses incidental to these agents' operations, inasmuch as the investigation trips will be circumscribed by a definite boundary, rather than covering large scopes of territory."

The eighteen districts were announced as follows:

First district, Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Connecticut; second, New York and New Jersey; third, Pennsylvania; fourth, West Virginia, Maryland, Delaware and part of Virginia; fifth, North Carolina and part of Virginia; sixth, South Carolina and Georgia; seventh, Florida, Porto Rico and Virgin Islands; eighth, Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana; ninth, Tennessee and Kentucky; tenth, Ohio, Indiana and Michigan, except the northern peninsula; eleventh, Illinois, Wisconsin and the northern peninsula of Michigan; twelfth, North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota, Iowa and Nebraska; thirteenth, Kansas, Missouri Oklahoma and Arkansas; fourteenth, Texas, except El Paso, Culberson, Hudspeth, Jeff Davis and Presidio counties; fifteenth, Arizona, New Mexico and the five Texas counties above; sixteenth, Colorado, Utah and Wyoming; seventeenth, Montana, Idaho, Oregon, Washington and Alaska, and eighteenth, California, Nevada and Hawaii.

Women Protest Against "Wet" Jokes

It is reported that the Committee on Patriotism and Law Enforcement of the New York City Federation of Women's Clubs recently adopted a resolution requesting every theatrical manager, movie manager and editor, whether of a daily, weekly or monthly publication, to see to it that all jokes ridiculing prohibition and its enforcement are eliminated from any production, film or article coming under his jurisdiction, and that the matter be treated with the seriousness that the subject merits; also that this resolution be thrown on the screen and printed in the different papers and magazines throughout the country.

New Jersey Methodist Preachers Pledge Aid to Dry Candidates

Three hundred New Jersey ministers in the New Jersey Methodist Episcopal conference, in its eighty-sixth annual meeting, held recently in Atlantic City, adopted by a rising vote a resolution in which they pledged themselves to support dry candidates, "even to the extent of taking the stump."

Bootlegger a Menace, Buyer Worse

The man who carries a hip-flask was recently characterized by Rev. Daniel A. Poling, LL. D., associate president of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, as a menace to peace and order. "The man who is worse than the bootlegger, is the chap the bootlegger supplies," said Dr. Poling. "This type boasts of his own crime while he rails at the police for failing to apprehend his less refined and more violent brother criminal.

"What all of us ought to know is the first principle of government—namely, that the violation and flouting of one law weakens all laws, undermines the foundation of society, and gives power to the hands that would run up the red flag of anarchy."

Delaware's Governor Upholds Volstead Act

The recent action of the Wilmington city council in passing a resolution favorable to beer and light wines has not been acceptable to the governor of the state nor to the people in general, according to the press. The council reported its action to Governor Denney, and received in return a most caustic reply, in which the governor stated unequivocally that he stands firmly and unalterably for the support and the enforcement of the Volstead Act. His bold stand has received the approval of hundreds of law-abiding bodies all over the state, and a move has been made to publicly commend him for the position he has taken.

Dry Violations Called Anarchy

The man who violates the Eighteenth Amendment is on a par with the man who plies the knife and torch for anarchy, according to the Rt. Rev. James Wise, Episcopal bishop of Kansas, who recently addressed the Sunday Evening Club of Chicago.

"It is about time prohibition laws of America cease to be considered a joke," he said. "They have been made a joke entirely too long. The time has come for all right-minded men to realize that violators of the Eighteenth Amendment are encouraging the breaking of all laws. They are the ones who are giving this country the reputation of being the most lawless nation on the earth. I have no more use for the man who violates the Eighteenth Amendment than for the red radical who starts out with a knife and a torch to wreck the long established institutions of our country."

Bishop Wise asserted the fundamental difficulty with the world today is not a question of economics, commercial or industrial stagnation or political machination, but it is a question of lack of adjustment of human relationships.

OUR NOTED BRITISH ALLIES

In Lady Wintringham and Lady Astor, members of the House of Commons of England, we have outspoken champions of the anti-alcohol movement. Lady Wintringham says: "The promotion of the temperance cause is very much on my heart. I am very eager to see much more definite and regular teaching on the subject of temperance in the schools. The growing generation is the most hopeful material upon which to work." Lady Astor, whose utterances against the alcohol evil have frequently been quoted in THE UNION SIGNAL, said recently, "No other single item plays as disastrous a havoc with human lives as drink. It is the main road to misery."

Law Violations in California City Reduced One-Half

According to the San Bernardino (Cal.) Sun, Chief of Police A. A. Burcham reports that law violations in the city have been reduced more than 50 per cent since the first of the year. "Numerous prohibition ordinance violations which were committed in public dance halls by youths openly displaying and drinking liquors have been lessened to such an extent that I dare say there are virtually no such offenders now in the city," said the chief. "When I first announced that the city was going to be given a general clean-up there were a few who took it as a joke. Some of those few are now in jail or have paid stiff fines, and the others apparently are willing to respect the law."

Enforcement Campaign in Philadelphia

"Under the slogan, 'The saloon must go,'" says the Philadelphia North American, "the co-operative temperance committee of West Philadelphia has reorganized with 1,000 live members and will take an active part in the coming political campaign.

"The committee's campaign calls for an investigation into the records of all candidates and a demand that West Philadelphia, which is a new congressional district, shall be represented only by men who will support the Volstead Act."

Wines in France Not Selling

According to the press, "National Wine Week" in France "opened with a conference to consider disposal of 'enormous stocks' of wines unsold because of American prohibition."

Verdicts of Philadelphia Juries Surprise and Pain Bootleggers

"Realization on the part of jurors that the integrity of the national Constitution is at stake in the prosecution of booze traffickers was strikingly evidenced recently at the first session of the 'bootlegger's court,' which United States Judge J. Whitaker Thompson opened in the Federal building," says the Philadelphia North American. "Two cases, in which it was quite plain that there were certain technical weaknesses in the government's testimony which would have permitted juries with 'wet' predilections to turn the scales in favor of the defendants, were put on trial. But in both instances verdicts of 'guilty' were registered.

"This was a severe setback to the bootlegging fraternity, whose agents infest the corridors outside the United States district courtroom, and who have been boasting blatantly that the outcome of the 150 trials scheduled to be heard before Judge Thompson would prove the Volstead act to be a 'joke'."

Presence of women on the juries is believed to have had much to do with the success of the government during the first day. As a result, the lawyer for the defense in the first case that was to be tried on the second day, by exercising his right of striking off three names, saw to it that all the women eligible for the jury were barred!

Figures Refute Statement of Massachusetts Wets That Drunkenness Has Increased Under Prohibition

In a letter to the Boston (Mass.) Post, a correspondent, in taking up the cudgel in defense of prohibition, points out the fact that while the antis claim that there has been a great increase in drunkenness under the dry regime, the record of the Department of Correction shows that the thirteen cities which had open saloons in 1917, the last year of license, then aggregated over 100,000 arrests for intoxication as against less than 43,000 in 1921.

Women Making Known Their Stand on Prohibition

While the beer and wine advocates have succeeded, according to the statements in the daily press, in putting a beer plank in the platform of the Citizens' Democratic Organization of Chicago, they were not so successful when it came to convincing the women of its wisdom. Mrs. Samuel Slade, head of the women's bureau, objected strenuously, and has issued the following statement, as given in the Chicago Herald-Examiner:

"The women candidates and the women's branch of the Citizens' Democratic Organization are not endorsing the light wine and beer plank of the men's platform as announced yesterday. They do not consider this issue involved in the present primary campaign. Nor can the question of prohibition as an amendment to the Federal Constitution be affected in any way by the result of the coming election."

One of the candidates supported by the Citizens' Organization, Mrs. Dora Donahoe, in a speech also made objection to the beer platform. "I favor a thoroughgoing enforcement of the law as it stands," she is quoted as saying. "Beer and wine mean the saloon and all its evils. Announcement from headquarters favoring beer and wine promotes sedition and is unworthy of Democrats."

ENFORCING PROHIBITION IN THE UNITED STATES

II. HOW SHALL WE DO IT?

W. C. Poole

The Public Schools and Enforcement

America's greatest need just now is a campaign for law and order. We have our first generation raised on uncensored movie films, and turned out for moonlight rides in automobiles without chaperones. In addition to this, a great many things were tolerated during the war in the name of patriotism, which did not make for loyal, law-abiding citizenship. The states are beginning to refuse to countenance uncensored films. It might be well for the national government to have a watchful eye on all newspapers, as well as movies, transported from one state to another.

In the meantime, the national board of education and every state and city board should proceed to define and teach in our public schools loyalty and real patriotism. This is especially needed in foreign quarters of our cities where parents get their ideas from their children who attend the American public schools.

Enforcement Through the Public Press

There have been hypocrites in the church, I suppose, ever since there have been churches, and we ministers have never been allowed to forget it by our critics, even if the hypocrites did not remind us. But I should like to ask some of those editors who love to preach to us preachers in their editorials to classify certain editors who claim to be loyal and then deliberately attempt to stab, hamstring and nullify an amendment to our national constitution and laws to uphold the same. Where would they have classed a traitor to his country who stood for the enemy during the late war as some editors have stood for booze? How far legislation will have to control the press is as yet uncertain. It had to prevent my city daily from bringing whisky advertisements to my home. However, even in the press the wonderful change in attitude almost takes one's breath. If you will read old copies of New York or Chicago dailies for 1914, and those for 1921 the wonderful house cleaning will be apparent. Moreover, the press excuses itself as being a mirror to reflect truthfully the times and conditions of society—not make or create them. If such be the case, a great change for the better has taken place.

Property Responsibility

Some of our crime and criminal hunting is not unlike a fox chase in which the fox is first turned loose. America catches and convicts fewer criminals in proportion to crime than any civilized first rank nation—such is the report. Whether it takes one generation, or ten of them, we will some day learn how to reduce the high cost of crime and criminals by short methods of capture and conviction. When every man who runs from a policeman finds a penitentiary sentence awaiting him for disrespect to a government official, we will not have so many policemen shot down in cold blood by worthless members of society. Officials who were shot down by moonshiners in the days of saloons were worth a dozen lives of the wretches who shot them.

Owners of automobiles used for bootlegging purposes are held responsible in many states under state acts, as well as national law. This law is a rapid growth of the last few years. Necessity has provided it. The only claim an outlaw has in law is justice—and most of them do not want that. A fundamental principle in all civilized governments is that NO MAN HAS A CLAIM TO PROTECTION FROM A FLAG WHICH HE DISHONORS AND TO WHICH HE IS NOT LOYAL. Grover Cleveland Bergdoll seeks no protection from the Stars and Stripes, neither should BOOZE OUTLAWS, THEIR AIDERS OR ABETTORS. Both are disloyal.

Enforcement Through Politics

An old southern negro defined a statesman as one who served his country, and a politician as one who made his country serve him. An old mammy declared that the difference between the two was just like the difference between mushrooms and toadstools—hard to distinguish till you had tried them and then it was too late. One was good and the other was poison.

Nevertheless, the personnel of office seekers and office holders is improving fast. All of them fear the supreme court of publicity and public opinion. There are doubtless traitors among public servants as there was one among twelve disciples, but I consider their moral character much higher than it was even ten years ago. Things tolerated then without mention are now given headlines in the public press.

A study of the members of Congress for the last ten years is a revelation of changing political conditions. The victims of righteous indignation are many. Every year seems to bring a higher class of candidates. This goes to make law and order in the nation—for the greatest law is the law of public sentiment. Much of the public speech-making in defense of alcohol is made for the benefit of certain saloon voters back home—for neither the church nor the press has a monopoly on hypocrites. They are in many places.

In the meantime, a national demand must be made that men who represent sections where outlaws are thick shall themselves, whether they be Senators, Congressmen or Governors, be loyal to the country they serve.

What Has Prohibition Done?

Well, let us see. Prohibition has closed nearly a quarter of a million saloons and breeding places of further patrons and saloon politicians, sent the workers into better, more self-respecting fields of labor, released the grasp of whisky advertisers on the public press, made many city dailies more respectable for family reading, closed the breweries and put many at better business, taught the people that the saloon is not a necessary social club as we have heard for a generation or more, protected childhood from the curse of liquor, given God a better chance to save the drunkard, saved to many homes for necessities and occasional luxuries the money formerly spent in the saloon, helped the ice cream business, raised citizenship to a higher standard, caused a demand for better public servants, helped grocers, meat dealers and shoe dealers to collect their bills, given clean officials a better chance to hold office and keep their own self-respect, made better business for banks and bankers, helped to remove danger while riding in automobiles, given children a better chance to be rightly born, rightly housed, fed and trained; and a thousand other things. Prohibition made it possible for me to travel through Pittsburg, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Chicago, Baltimore, Washington, visit the inauguration last March, and finally see Home Run Baker knock a home run on the baseball grounds in New York City—and all of this without seeing a drunk, a drink or a drinking man, although I moved in the crowd. Five years ago I would have seen a hundred drunks in a trip like that. Folks say there are many speak-easies—which I cannot deny—but I do know they are speaking much easier than before prohibition. Ten years ago I could pick up a dozen whisky bottles in a five mile ride along the country roads of my state where there was local option at that time. Now I have to use quart fruit cans instead of quart whisky bottles, formerly so plentiful, but no longer available, for carriage or automobile oil.

Pointers on Prohibition Enforcement

"President Harding was appealed to recently to issue a proclamation urging a nation-wide organization for law enforcement, similar to the Law Enforcement League operating in this city," says the Philadelphia North American. "A similar letter was sent to Secretary of the Treasury Mellon, setting forth the object of the league and requesting him to indorse publicly the movement to make possible a real enforcement of the law."

Opponents of prohibition are "continually, perpetually and abominably" pointing to the number of deaths from "hooch," the drinking of varnish and other vile concoctions, as an argument against the Eighteenth Amendment, but according to C. H. Boyer, Chicago manager of the casualty department of the National Life Insurance Company, as reported by the Chicago Evening American, "the cold figures show that prohibition has cut in half deaths from strong drink and quarrels subsequent to drinking." And figures are rather convincing!

The Janesville (Wis.) Gazette, in commenting editorially on the improved conditions in that city and vicinity, evidently due to a well enforced law, and contrasting them with the unhappy results of the lawlessness that prevails in larger places like Chicago and New York, pertinently remarks that while there are said to be many things to correct in the institution of prohibition "after all, it depends on the attitude of the law abiding people, the officers who are charged with the enforcement, and the courts. Any person knows, that without the support, or the willful blindness of the officials, there would be no 5,000 saloons where wood alcohol and its by-products, death and hell, could be had for the asking at a dollar a drink. Back of the movement for the light wines and beer and places to sell them is the same element that is guilty of this very failure to support the law. The bootlegger watching his victim die, well exclaims 'Did I not tell you that prohibition was a failure!'"

GOD SPEED THE W. C. T. U. OF MEXICO!

Anna Adams Gordon

My Mexico! My Mexico!
God shed His grace on thee,
And crown thy good with brotherhood
From sea to shining sea.

The rapturous singing by the winsome girls of the Sara L. Keen College in Mexico City of a Mexican adaptation of Katharine Lee Bates' beautiful hymn closed a happy hour spent with them one Sunday evening. May God answer the melodious prayer of these young student patriots. May we not prophesy that in a new and significant sense we shall learn to say, "Our Mexico" as they in fellowship shall exclaim, "Our United States!"

W. C. T. U. Well Equipped With Officers

The eager response by Mexican adults, young people and children, to the white ribbon appeal challenges us to more intensive and systematic co-operation. The National Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Mexico is well equipped with officers, with a national organizer and with superintendents of a few of the most essential departments. Our hopes, our hearts, our prayers are all with these comrades beloved on their mission of peace, purity, total abstinence and prohibition.

Newly Elected W. C. T. U. President Deeply Interested in all Social Welfare Work

Senorita Ernestina Alvarado, the gifted young president who has studied in the United States, is deeply interested in social welfare work. She has a passion for her people. She longs to help lead Mexican women into broader fields of educational and social welfare activities. Among her distinguished friends and helpful advisers are the Ministers of Education, Hon. Jose Vasconcelos, and Prof. Andres Osuna. Bishop and Mrs. Thirkield, Dr. Cook at the head of the Department of Education for the Methodist Church, and leaders in the missionary schools and colleges of the Methodist and other denominations will heartily co-operate in pushing to success the reorganized or re-officered W. C. T. U. Much regret was expressed that Mrs. Dwight Furness would not soon return to Mexico. She was elected to the vice-presidency and through correspondence her valued assistance will be retained.

Scientific Temperance Instruction Has a Large Place in Christian Education

The program of Christian education in Mexico has a large place for scientific temperance instruction. It is providential that during the closing years of the presidency of General Porfirio Diaz, Mrs. Addie Northam Fields of Illinois gave four years of unstinted devotion to anti-alcohol propaganda, largely in the schools of Mexico. Mexico's chief executive and many of her governors aided Mrs. Fields' vigorous campaign. Missionaries were most hospitable and helpful. She is gratefully remembered alike by Protestants and Catholics. Quickly acquiring the use of Spanish, she organized many local unions and Loyal Temperance Legions and implanted temperance principles in the heads and hearts of hundreds of boys and girls in government schools—from Chihuahua to Yucatan. On the day a party of us in Mexico City were shown through the stately rooms of Chapultepec Castle, the "White House" of Mexico, countless reminders of President Diaz were pointed out. Again I thanked God for Mrs. Fields' unselfish toil and for the influential backing constantly given her by General Diaz.

Consecrated Men and Women Did Pioneer Work in Mexico

Mrs. Nelle G. Burger, Mrs. Ella Hoover Thacher, Mrs. Helen M. Stoddard and others "of ours" also have helped create the public sentiment which some glad day will purify the national life of our neighbor republic. Easily could an entire issue of THE UNION SIGNAL be filled with tributes of admiration and gratitude to the heroic missionaries and educators who have patiently builded their lives into the betterment of the perplexing Republic of Mexico. The glorious achievements of the Butlers, the Howlands, the Conwells, Dr. Chas. W. Drees and figures equally outstanding among Presbyterians and other church groups, together with Mexican preachers and teachers of striking personality and power, shall be rewarded. Mexico shall be redeemed!

Pulque to be Seen Everywhere

In company with an elect party of Methodists, I enjoyed a delightful visit to Puebla and later to the Methodist General Conference in Pachuca. On the route to Puebla our train steamed along through miles and miles of pulque plantations, for this is the pulque section of Mexico. One of the estates through which we passed covers seven thousand acres, farmed out to the maguey or century plant. A pulque plant matures in seven years and yields about thirty-five dollars worth of a milk-white fluid. Quite appropriately the peons use pig skins as receptacles for this, their favorite intoxicant. Donkeys laden with bulging pulque-filled pig skins are a common sight. At every station where our train stopped, women and children were in evidence with jugs of pulque from which to supply the thirsty traveler. Rugs, shawls, scarfs, laces, linen drawn work, canes, pottery,—everywhere and all the time you are importuned to buy. If the train stops long enough and the scale of prices descends with sufficient rapidity, a deal is consummated through the open car window.

At Puebla the Methodists have a fine Normal School for Girls and an Institute for Boys. Wide-awake young Mexicans from families of the better class patronize these schools and cannot fail to influence for high ideals the tomorrow of Mexico. It was a privilege to give a temperance message in the Methodist Church on Sunday and to participate in the welcome given our Bishops and their wives.

W. C. T. U. Work Presented at General Conference of Methodist Church

At picturesque Pachuca, a large gold and silver mining town, the General Conference, in charge of Bishop Thirkield, was a revelation of the rich fruits of Christian faith and work. The Bishop generously gave me an opportunity to present our program. Here I met Dr. Levi Salmans of Guanajuato, always a staunch friend of the temperance cause, and the compiler of a book of temperance songs, widely used throughout Mexico. Here also were assembled elect women from the leading schools of Methodism. It was a high privilege to come in close touch with these gifted women missionaries and teachers.

Woman Suffrage Society Organized In Mexico

An electrician's strike was on when I returned to Mexico City. For several days large sections of the city were cut off from light and water, the people suffering great inconvenience. Strikes of greater or less seriousness are constantly occurring. Bull fights are given each week in the capital city with sixteen thousand spectators but a Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children and Animals has recently been organized, Dr. Vasconcelos being the honorary president. Progressive Mexican women are taking advantage of public opinion more favorable to their interests. A woman suffrage society is in its initial stage and the Y. W. C. A. hopes this year to gain a firm foothold in Mexico.

On March 5, my last Sunday in Old Mexico, I spoke in the Baptist Church in the morning, in the afternoon at a large W. C. T. U. meeting in the Gante Street Methodist Church, and in the evening in the Methodist Sara L. Keen College where the girls seem just like those of our own beloved land.

God speed the W. C. T. U. in Mexico!

In the Federal District of Mexico, covering Mexico City and nearby towns, last year $7,250,000 was expended for education besides $1,000,000 spent by the Council of Mexico City for municipal schools. Despite the fact that the country has been torn by revolution, Mexico City has nearly doubled its public schools during the last ten years and the number of pupils during that time has more than doubled.

WOMEN IN INDUSTRY BECOME "MILLIONAIRES"

Laura Parks Miller, National Director

Pennsylvania intends to do its full share in the membership campaign for employed women. Mrs. Florence E. Geist, state superintendent of the department of Women in Industry for Pennsylvania, has made plans for a big drive to enlist the support and adherence of many good women who, through thoughtlessness, have not been reached by the union. In a message to her county officers she emphasizes the wonderful opportunity which the effort for "One Woman in Industry in Every Three New Members" gives, and urges an appeal to women as voters interested in women in industry laws and conditions in which they can and should have a voice.

Mrs. Azuba Jones of Johnstown, Pa., who spent six months abroad last year, making a special study of social and economic conditions, co-operates as organizer in this campaign. The plans outlined are to consider all employed American women as assets, and to attempt any of three suggestions as fitted to local conditions:

(1) A special employed women's branch holding night meetings to be supervised by the older W. unions.

(2) A union made up wholly or mainly of employed women in a community where there is no union, probably with evening meetings.

(3) An enlarged membership of an existing union, and arrangement for some night meetings.

The W. I. I.—Not the I. W. W.—Popular This Year in Mid-West

Monticello, Iowa, has an enthusiastic band of twenty-two women who are doing splendid work in furtherance of the objects of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

A short time ago these women workers met at the home of Mrs. William H. Laude and organized "The W. I. I.," or women in industry group of the W. C. T. U., a feature being the harmony between employer and employe, represented by the fact that all the women are factory employes, with Mrs. Laude as their superintendent, and Mr. Laude owner, and employer in the factory.

At the meeting the officers elected for three months were as follows: Mrs. Laude, president; Ida Kessling, vice-president; Genevieve Glenn, secretary; Kathrine Schneider, treasurer.

The members were keenly interested in discussions relating to citizenship, and after two other meetings, it was decided to call a mass meeting of the women of the town. Need had been felt for some changes in the city officers, in order that the present laws might be properly enforced, and as no one else seemed inclined to make a move in this direction the group took the initiative. They have pledged nearly a quarter of the population to the support of a clean ticket at the spring elections.

Star-In-The-Window In One Hundred Homes

In this little city about one hundred homes have displayed the white law observance star, another evidence that the work has already borne good fruit.

Previous to the voting out of the saloon, that menace to their homes and dear ones stared all women in the face, and roused to vigorous, concerted action the thoughtful and loving ones. Today the bootlegger threatens them no less, and makes necessary even more forceful and united action. And down in Arkansas the women are accepting the challenge.

In town after town where in the days of state-wide prohibition campaigns, large and enthusiastic unions were organized, the good women have been lulled into false hope of cessation of warfare against the age-long enemy of man, alcohol, and the chain of mutual helpfulness with others is severed. But even where there never was a saloon there is now a moonshine still and the product thereof is largely in evidence, while the bootlegger, grown very bold through the patronage of "leading citizens," plies his death-dealing trade nightly.

Watch Arkansas! At Harrisburg, which I visited in a great ice-storm recently, a hundred women headed by the two resident pastors of the town, one Monday marched round the courthouse square and into the court room to ask of the judge there some reforms—the rejection of certain jurors and dismissal of certain deputies as unfit, the appointment of certain other deputies, and a more vigorous prosecution of law breakers in town and county.

The judge welcomed the women and assured them that he was in full accord with their demands and glad of their co-operation. Several jurors were excused, deputies discharged (and others appointed) and certain hangers-on made themselves scarce. The fire is started.

In something over five weeks in the northeastern corner of the state, I have had the pleasure of organizing two unions where none ever was, of reorganizing where the work had ceased for one or more years, of securing names for unions to be formed later in several places, and of assisting in awakening from a nap three more. The S. T. L. essay contest plan has been adopted in

SIDELIGHTS ON THE PROHIBITION SITUATION BY PROMINENT PENMEN

"If Prohibition Isn't Being Enforced What Are They Kicking About?"

"At a literary club in New York a cattleman from Texas was being entertained," says a writer in the Saturday Evening Post of March 18. "He had been drinking a bottle of real beer, the first he had tasted in a year or so. He was enjoying himself immensely, when one of the party, exhibiting one of these cartoons, (anti-prohibition) began to orate on what a terrible thing it was to have our personal liberty abridged and how New York resented it.

"'Just a minute,' interrupted the Texan, somewhat surprised and genuinely puzzled.

"'Let me get this thing right. If prohibition is not being enforced, and you fellers can get all the licker you want, as you say and as that paper says, what are you kicking about?'

"That stopped the argument. There was no ready answer. Someone mumbled something about the principle of the thing, but the general effect was a shot right through the argument.

"The Texan had not so intended his question. He was really curious to understand the viewpoint.

"Yes, what were we kicking about?

"Yes, if New York, officially admitted to be the wettest state in the Union, can get all the liquor it wants, why all the violent protest? Why the frequent scenes of public resentment?

"The answer is, of course, that it can't do any such thing. Right now there is less drinking in proportion to the population in New York than there was when the old settlers got the Indian chiefs tea'd up and talked them out of Manhattan Island for something like a shilling.

"In spots the drinking is unusually heavy, particularly among that class of well-to-do men who in the old days could afford to buy champagne. Among the wage-earning people there is a positive conviction that the governor of North Carolina, in his historic remark to the governor of South Carolina, had it right. 'It is more than a long time between drinks. In many cases it is permanent.

Hooch Getting Scarcer

"The fact is there is not enough liquor to go round, and it is getting scarcer all the time. Aside from normal restraint, which doesn't cut much figure in New York, the average man is either unable to pay the price or he is afraid to take a chance with bad stuff. A week of a blind tiger would either kill or cure the most stubborn.

"Public records show that whisky is being withdrawn from bonded warehouses at the rate of 972,000 gallons a month now, as against 8,000,000 gallons a month prior to prohibition. The present available supply of real whisky, therefore, is about 12 per cent of what we used to be.

"There are no statistics on moonshine, hooch and stuff smuggled across the borders. Students of the situation say, though, that all of that could not possibly equal the 972,000 gallons drawn from warehouses. But assume that it does. Then a total would show that the country is getting only 24 per cent of the liquor it formerly got. In other words, whether we like it or not, the consumption of whisky in the United States has decreased 75 per cent. It isn't here to consume.

"That's what the boys are kicking about—not the principle of the thing, but the lack of liquor. The tighter the shoe pinches the louder the holler.

"One prohibitionist thinks it might be a good idea to let them draw all the remaining supply of whisky in one month and get it over with. With that gone, he says the country will be 99 per cent sober. The hooch makers would never be able to supply more than 1 per cent."

> "I dined with two brewers, whose former products were well known throughout the United States.
> "'The trouble with all the arguments against prohibition,' one of them said, 'is that they are negative. No one has ever been able to show where drinking did anybody any good.'"

Uncle Henry Argues With the Cub Reporter on the "Swift and Stealthy Onslaught of the Prohibition Law"

(Excerpt from "Uncle Henry," in Collier's March 18)

"I had a long talk yesterday with an old friend who used to be in the brewery business out in St. Louis. As fine a type of American as you'd want to meet, though I don't suppose he ever will get naturalized now. The secrecy of it is what Gus can't forgive. If the prohibition people had only acted square and open; if they'd ever let anybody know they weren't satisfied with the way saloons were being run, Gus says things could have been fixed up nice and satisfactory all around. But no! The derned fanatics didn't have manhood enough for that. Of course Gus blames himself for not havin' been more on his guard, but how was it possible for anyone to have so much as a suspicion of the conspiracy that was hatchin'? Why, darn it all, if anything in the world seemed settled, it was an American's right to drink what, when, an' where he pleased. * * * * *

"What's that you're mumblin'? State after state and city after city was dry before national prohibition came? Utter nonsense. I've talked with hundreds of brewers, distillers, rectifiers, and bartenders, an' all of 'em tell me that not until the blow fell did any of 'em have the least warnin' of danger. Compared to that prohibition crowd, moles were as open an' aboveboard as airplanes. You ought to hear Gus tell how they slipped it through Congress.

"The House an' Senate, slippin' out of Washington by ones an' twos, met on an island in the Potomac at midnight, an', speakin' entirely in whispers, voted to submit the accursed amendment. State legislatures, with equal stealth, gathered after dark in swamps, graveyards, and haunted houses to ratify the savage pact. Not till then was any citizen permitted to know anything about it.

After the Worm Turned

"It's goin' to be a long while before the bitternesses of that day are healed," Uncle Henry predicted sadly. "Y'see, it wasn't only the unfairness of the attack, owin' to its secrecy, but there's also the blacker crime of treachery. * *

"When you stop to think of this black treachery piled on the top of all that secrecy, was it any wonder that our courage was crushed down into the very dirt for a while? Finally, however, the old American spirit commenced to lift itself, an' here an' there, in cellar, attic, or lonely field, the worm began to turn, or maybe distill is the technical term for it.

"It's been a brave fight," said Uncle Henry. "None braver was ever waged, but, jes' between you an' me, I'm afraid it's a losin' one. On every hand bathrooms are bein' restored to their natural uses, an' as you come down the street in the mornin' you can smell other things besides sour mash. Many bitter disappointments have contrived to shatter courage an' confidence. After all the talk an' high hope, yeast turned out worse'n nothin' at all. Same way with raisins. Even after treatin' 'em with a wrinkle remover, they had nothing to offer that was in any ways competent, relevant, an' material. As for the various varnishes, benzines, wood alcohol, an' sweet spirits of niter, it's simply the case that we've gone too far away from the old, sturdy pioneer stock. We can't stand 'em. Too many years of soft livin' an' soft drinkin' behind us. No sociability about 'em, either. Wild stuff, some of it. A good friend of mine out in Missouri's been up in top of a tree for three weeks, an' they jes' can't get him to come down.

"Of course a brave front's still bein' kept up. There's a lot of talk about the direct results to be obtained by feedin' juniper berries to dairy cows, an' here in Washington a bunch of Congressmen have the idea they can bring about a repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment. Not a chance! At various times I've lived in Kansas, Colorado, an' other states where they've been prohibitionin' for the last twenty years or so. When it's once done, my boy, it's done for all time. Liquor never comes back."

"Me? Why, I Was Always For It"

"You've been mighty sarcastic today," said the Cub Reporter. "But now you're telling the truth."

"I'm tellin' what I know," said Uncle Henry. "Your average American will bellow about his booze an' even fight for it, if the other fellow isn't too big, but he won't vote for it. When you're fightin' you've got company, but when you vote you're by yourself. I don't want any saloon by my home where I'm tryin' to bring up my children decently. Then what right have I got to put it by some other man's home? I don't want my children to become drunkards, but if the law legalizes it, what can I do about it? Worst of all, each year sees a new generation comin' on—boys an' girls who never saw a saloon an' don't know what you're yellin' about. Then private stocks run out, judges quit treatin' bootleggin' as a joke, an' at last there comes a day when you hear yourself sayin': 'Me? Why, I was always for it!'"

Evanston, Illinois, March 30, 1922

The members of the National W. C. T. U. Headquarters "family" are very happy over the return of the national president, Miss Anna Adams Gordon, after an absence of six weeks, spent largely in Old Mexico. Another delightful article from her pen appears in this week's issue, to be followed next week by the last of the series.

Special Features of Next Issue of Union Signal

The next issue, April 6, will be of unusual interest. It will contain strong testimony to the benefits of prohibition, in the form of original letters, from the mayors of many of our largest cities, among them, Los Angeles, Salt Lake City, Wilmington (Delaware), Oklahoma City.

Other attractive special features will be a graphic word picture of conditions in Mexico by Anna Adams Gordon, contributed articles on law observance by Gene Stratton Porter, Marietta Holley and other prominent women, and the first of a new series on Studies in Citizenship by Deborah Knox Livingston. The issue will be of valuable help in the Membership and Law Enforcement campaigns. A special rate of $2.50 a hundred is made. Send in your order promptly.

"Twinkle, Twinkle, Little Star"

The W. C. T. U. of Fond du Lac, Wisconsin, will place in a window of every school in Fond du Lac county the "white star" Law Observance card.

Seattle's first Law Observance star was placed in the front window of Judge J. T. Ronald's residence. Judge Ronald is a prominent member of the bar and an outspoken champion of prohibition. A pretty ceremony marked the installation of this decoration, many of the leaders of the W. C. T. U. participating.

WORLD'S W. C. T. U. CONVENTION, PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA, NOVEMBER 11-16, 1922
NATIONAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION, ATLANTIC CITY, NEW JERSEY, NOVEMBER 18-23, 1922

The Atlanta (Ga.) Railway Company has promised the president of the Georgia W. C. T. U. that it will place in its 400 cars, for a week, free of charge, a poster advertising the W. C. T. U. Law Observance cards. On the poster are the words: "Join the nationwide campaign for law observance. Put a 'Star' in your window. Cards may be found in stores on Whitehall Street."

Orders for approximately half a million of the Law Observance cards have been received and filled by the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, and the demand for them continues to grow. Have you "starred" your city?

Preparing for the Primaries

In the spring a modern woman's fancy seriously turns to thoughts of candidates and their fitness for office. How is she to become informed as to their qualifications? An experienced W. C. T. U. worker suggests a "Candidates Meeting" as a help in securing enlightenment on this question. To certain members should be delegated the task of investigating the records, character, and general fitness of aspirants for political office. Full reports can be given at this meeting, the combined information furnishing the facts needed to guide the women voters at the primaries. At this gathering every member should be asked to assume the responsibility of seeing that five other women, outside the W. C. T. U., register, become informed regarding candidates and issues, and vote at the primaries. In addition, they should be urged to call up on the telephone five other fellow-citizens, give them the benefit of the knowledge they have gained, and suggest the desirability of their registering and going to the primaries.

In order to impress the women of the community with the importance of doing their full civic duty at this critical time in the nation's history, a committee should be appointed to arrange for five or ten minute talks at the missionary societies of the various churches, the women's clubs, the D. A. R., Parent-Teacher Association, and other women's societies.

Remember the primaries and do your full duty!

Speed up The "Thinking Machines"

One feels at times an inclination to agree with Thomas Edison in his rather cynical remark that "There is no expedient a man will not adopt in order to avoid the necessity for thinking." Many of the loose assertions and comments on prohibition heard nowadays plainly indicate a sad lack of thought on the subject. It is of course trite to say that the crying need of the hour is to get the people to "think through" the serious problems with which they are faced, and not to be content with letting their favorite newspaper perform tha service for them.

The Michigan W. C. T. U. has inaugurated an excellent "thought starter" in its series of prize essay contests in the public schools, on such topics as "Reasons for Law Violation," "The Underlying Causes of Lawlessness," "Undergirding the Law," "Individual Responsibility for Law Enforcement." The Indiana W. C. T. U. has arranged for the students of its colleges and universities a similar contest on the topic "Why the Volstead Act Should Be Upheld." The prohibition question is being brought to the attention of our young people through debates in schools, and when they are furnished with accurate facts these discussions and contests prove very helpful. A correspondent writes of one held in a Massachusetts school which resulted in a change of opinion on the part of a participant not in favor of prohibition, and likewise of her father.

It is vitally important that the young people should be provided with the right kind of material to help them in the preparation of essays, declamations and debates. Keep in touch with the teachers, and assure them that you will be glad to furnish students with leaflets and other data that can be relied upon. See that THE UNION SIGNAL is kept on file in the college and public school libraries.

Liquid Sandpaper

An eastern paper tells the story of a citizen of New Haven, Connecticut, who had the misfortune, while moving into a new office, recently, to spill a large bottle of ink. Having nothing at hand as an eradicator, he made use of some "moonshine whisky" which had been presented to him. According to the story, the experiment was startlingly successful, for not only did every trace of ink disappear, but a large patch of the floor was bleached perfectly white.

Commenting on the incident a western journal suggests that "some day when human beings discard 'hooch' as a beverage, it may come into its own as a liquid substitute for sandpaper."

As an eradicator of sorts, however moonshine is becoming constantly better known. It is found that it eradicates not only the lining of the digestive tract, but also the eyesight, the mind, and in a great majority of instances the very lives of those who use it. The sooner it is decided by the country at large that the only safe and sane way to use it is externally, as "liquid sandpaper," the better it will be for all concerned.

In sending money to the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, to THE UNION SIGNAL, or the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, please either send a draft on Chicago or New York, a postoffice money order, or add five cents to pay cost of exchange on checks or drafts on local banks. Cashier's or certified checks are not exempt from this charge, which is made necessary by the ruling of the Chicago Clearing House, through which all checks sent to us pass for collection.

The A. F. L. and the Beer Question

The action of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor, in advocating amendment of the Volstead Act to restore light wines and beer, has called forth a host of comments from the press of the country.

"For whom do they speak?" asks the Mitchell (S. D.) Republican, in an editorial which recounts some of the benefits brought to the working man by prohibition, adding, "It is not the first time that labor leaders have compromised that great body of men."

"The campaign for the restoration of so called beer and 'light' wines is a campaign to destroy prohibition," asserts the Galesburg (Ill.) Register, which recalls that this is the same set of labor leaders who "fought the passage of the national prohibition law," and that they are "backing this wet movement does not signify that on a moral question that small coterie of men control the conscience of the American workingman."

The Des Moines (Iowa) Tribune suggests that the American Federation of Labor leaders read the Eighteenth Amendment, which prohibits the "manufacture, sale or transportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes." It recalls the fact that the Internal Revenue department for years held that one-half of one per cent of alcoholic content is the dividing line between intoxicating and non-intoxicating liquors, and pertinently inquires: "Is it likely that the Supreme Court will permit much change from that ruling whether or not there is a Volstead Act? Without reversal from the Eighteenth Amendment it is idle to talk about legalizing the sale of wine and beer. Neither one will ever be sold legally as long as that amendment is on the books."

"It looks very much as if prohibition would have to be fought out along the present line," says the Boston (Mass.) Traveler.

The editor of the Oshkosh (Wis.) Northwest is of the opinion that if the recommendation of the executive council of the federation is carried out and the question taken to the polls at the coming fall elections, it will have to be treated as a local issue, and "of course it is going to make hard sledding for those who run for office."

"The opponents of back-from-Elba for the liquor business should not let themselves be caught napping in these matters," warns the Lincoln (Nebraska) Journal, speaking of the possibility that the action of the labor organization means a reopening of the liquor question in Congress. "Nebraska has been without saloons long enough to forget some of their seamier aspects. The proposal of the advocates of liquor is an insidious one. Just beer and wine is all they ask—now. There has been time to forget what this means. There has been time to forget that it was beer and wines, not ardent spirits, that served as indispensable adjuncts of the brothel and of commercialized vice in general. We are apt to forget that this innocent return of the beer and wine business carries with it the return of those other worse businesses. Unless there is an adequate course of reminders, this effort to insert a wedge might win."

The Dubuque (Iowa) Herald believes that if the federation requires every candidate to declare himself unequivocally it will perform a genuine service for the country, and that such a rule would produce a feeling of uneasiness among certain candidates who have "been trying to carry water on both shoulders, or rather beer on one and water on the other." On a question of such general and permanent importance, "every candidate having a position of legislative authority should be interrogated and his answer published in advance of election."

The Tacoma (Wash.) Ledger asserts that the executive council of the A. F. L., in stating that the Volstead Act is a failure and a "breeder of contempt for all law," have made a serious indictment of the law, and goes on to impress upon its readers that "If the Volstead Act is a social and moral failure, two classes of people are to blame—the lawless man, who for exorbitant gain, manufactures and deals in intoxicants, and that portion of the public lawless enough to disobey the mandate of law by the purchase and use of the prohibited articles." The second class by becoming law-abiding can force the first out of business. With this as a text the editor emphasizes the need of law enforcement and the right of the majority to rule.

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awakening continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

The Aaronic Benediction

Used by the W. C. T. U. at Meetings

The Lord bless thee, and keep thee. The Lord make His face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee. The Lord lift up His countenance upon thee, and give thee peace. Num. 6:24, 25, 26.

Mere Living Becomes Real Life When it Becomes Sacrificial

We begin to operate with vital forces when we cross the border into the land of sacrifice. So long as we remain among the superfluities we are in the shadowy realm of existence, and we have not yet begun to live. Christ does not begin his reckoning, we do not come within the range of the heavenly standards, until all superfluities have been peeled and stripped away. The things that we can spare carry no blood. The things that we can ill spare carry part of ourselves, and are alive. "He that spared not his own son," the one he could not spare, gave himself with the gift, and in the wealth of the sacrifice our redemption was born.

France Should Become Fruit Grower of Europe

"Taking advantage of the great depression in the wine market due to the war and to prohibition in other countries, which affects French exportation, temperance propaganda has taken the direction of urging fruit growers of the Midi to produce other fruits than hops and grapes, and to use them in the manufacture of soft drinks, fruit juices, syrups, jams and jellies," says The Survey. "They suggest as a further remedy for the precarious situation of the hop growers—who are at the mercy of extreme fluctuations in the price of wines as well as the depreciation of their lands—that they follow the successful example of the department of Poitou and Charentes, where dairying and vegetable raising have been made possible by means of irrigation. The value of the land has risen, and the condition of the farmers has been greatly ameliorated. A. Daude-Bancel, in a pamphlet on constructive drink reform, points out that France has the mild climate requisite to fruit growing and should become the fruit grower of Europe."

The True Beverage of Life

There is a liquor which God, the eternal, brews for all His children. Not in the simmering still over smoky fires, choked with poisonous gases, and surrounded with the stench of sickening odors and rank corruption, doth your Father in heaven prepare the precious essence of life, the pure cold water; but in the green glade and grassy dell, where the red deer wanders and the child loves to play. There God Himself brews it; and down, down in the deep valleys where the fountains murmur and the rills sing; and high on the tall mountain tops, where the naked granite glitters like gold in the sun, where the storm clouds brood, and the thunder tones crash; and away off on the wide, wide sea, where the hurricane howls music, and the big waves roar the chorus, 'sweeping the march of God'—there He brews it, that beverage of life, health-giving water! And everywhere it is a thing of beauty, gleaming in the dew-drop, singing in the summer rain, shining in the ice gem, till the trees all seem turned to living jewels, spreading a golden veil over the setting sun, or a white gauze around the midnight moon; sporting in the cataract, sleeping in the glacier, dancing in the fall shower; folding its bright snow curtains softly about the wintry world; and weaving the many colored iris, that seraph's zone of the sky whose warp is the rain drops of earth, whose woof is the sunbeam of heaven, all checkered over with celestial flowers by the mystic hand of refraction, still always it is beautiful, that blessed life—water! No poison bubbles on its brink; its foam brings not madness and sin; no blood stains its limpid glass; pale widows and starving orphans weep not burning tears in its depths; no drunkard's shrieking ghost from the grave curses it in words of eternal despair! Would you exchange it for the demon's drink—alcohol?

W. C. T. U. History in the Making

Reception to Mrs. Hatcher at Governor's Mansion

Upon the return to Alaska of Mrs. Cornelia Templeton Hatcher, president of the Alaska W. C. T. U., after a visit of several months in the United States, she was tendered a reception at the governor's mansion at Juneau. Over 150 guests, representing the leading people of the city, paid their respects to Mrs. Hatcher. After greetings and refreshments, she gave an interesting talk on "From Willow Creek to Washington." Mrs. Hatcher is en route to her home in Willow Creek and is taking with her from Detroit, Michigan, her little granddaughter, to spend the summer with her. She writes, "I find our work in Alaska, particularly in Juneau, flourishing beyond all expectation. Fifty-eight new members have been added to the Juneau W. C. T. U. during the past month, through the personal work of Mrs. John B. Marshall, wife of the Federal prohibition director for the territory."

Macon's Membership Stunt

The Macon (Georgia) W. C. T. U. is large and has church treasurers to collect the dues from the W. C. T. U. members in the respective churches. Mrs. B. B. Renitz, of the Mulberry St. Methodist church, most happily visualized her report at a recent meeting. She had collected $105, which represented the dues of the superintendent of the Sunday school, his assistant, the choir leader and pianist, teachers in the Baraca, Philathea and other classes, chairman of board of stewards and trustees, wife of the pastor, president and other officers of the missionary society and church officials and members, $10 for a life membership and dues for five new members. These she changed into crisp new dollar bills. From them she fashioned a "long green" scarf $5 wide and $21 long, which she draped around Mrs. G. P. Gostin, the treasurer, until she was literally "wrapped in money." Pretty, witty little speeches were made by both. The scarf was voted "most becoming" and the designer warmly praised.

"Do Everything" Plan Popular

Every union in Indiana county, Pennsylvania, is participating in an institute; every union except one is holding a medal contest, the medal to be donated and presented by Hon. J. T. Davis, state director of prohibition. Every union, save one, is knitting an afghan for wounded soldiers. Miss Rebecca Rhoads, national superintendent of Social Welfare, is to visit the county next month and receive the afghan shower. The Mothers of Democracy and the American Legion are to be guests of honor. A Child Welfare exhibit, sent out by the state superintendent of that department, is touring the county and is being well received. Mrs. I. M. Lewis of Marchand is the president of this alert and progressive county.

Minnesota Membership Mounting

The Wells (Minn.) W. C. T. U. was one of many unions that has benefited recently from a visit from Mrs. Josephine E. Sizer, state W. C. T. U. president. She spoke of Americanization and Child Welfare at the afternoon meeting. Sunday morning she gave addresses at Walters and Walnut Grove, and spoke to a large audience Sunday evening, on "The Law of Our Land" at the M. E. church of Wells. New members were gained.

W. C. T. U. Edits Town Paper

The W. C. T. U. of Hawkinsville, Georgia, has made an agreement with the editor of the Hawkinsville Dispatch to bring out its last issue in March, the number to be called "The Good Times Edition." In addition to the average amount of reading matter, it will contain a supplement, cheery and optimistic in character, devoted to the work of the Hawkinsville and Pulaski county people. Everyone who has a commodity to sell, hire, lease or dispose of in any way, from yard brooms to diamonds, or whose labor, from shining shoes to running a bank, has a marketable value, will be offered the opportunity to take advertising space. Whatever is realized will be used for temperance work in Pulaski county.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

POPULARIZING THE POLYGLOT PETITION

"Please be present in Phyllis Pearson's parlor on April fourth, at eight p. m., with a plan to propose for promoting the Polyglot Petition.

"Chairman Committee on Polyglot Petition."

Each of the twenty-seven members of the Everest Y. P. B. received this notice in the morning mail on a certain March day, and straightway twenty-seven alert, youthful brains began to ponder on ways and means of pushing the movement to secure signatures to the historic document.

A dozen young men and women were gathered in the cozy living room of the Pearsons when Rhoda Tremont, a basket on her arm, breezed in on Tuesday evening.

"Bringing your supper with you, Rhoda?" was the laughing greeting.

"No, but something you'll pronounce equally delectable, I'm certain," responded the smiling girl. "I'm prepared to demonstrate my plan for promoting the Polyglot Petition."

"You make us very curious," said her hostess. "We're all ready for you. This occasion is to be entirely informal, no calling the meeting to order or adjournment, just a free-for-all discussion of plans. Proceed, Rhoda, with your demonstration."

Selecting a small table, standing in a corner of the room, Rhoda began to take various articles from her bag. In the center of the table she placed a small globe, encircled by a white ribbon. Against the wall as a background she stood maps of both hemispheres, then piled in pyramid fashion on each side rolls of paper to represent the one mile of canvas in the original Polyglot Petition. She laid flat on the table in a conspicuous place sheets of paper bearing the heading of the Polyglot Petition, with a bottle of ink and a pen ready for use. Diving into her capacious basket, Rhoda produced miniature figures in costumes of various foreign countries, which added picturesqueness to the scene: A Chinaman, an African, a Hindoo, an Eskimo, an American Indian.

"Most artistic," cried her comrades. "How very effective!" "What an object lesson!" "Where are you going to put it?"

"In the most prominent window of Poole & Porter's department store," said Rhoda with positiveness. "They don't know it yet, but I intend to inform them tomorrow morning."

"They'll do it," said Bert Wilson. "Never knew anybody who could resist Rhoda when she made up her mind."

"I'm sorry for the rest of us—we can't possibly surpass or equal Rhoda's demonstration," said the chairman of the Polyglot Petition committee. "But I'll give you all a chance. Who'll be first?"

"I've my cue," said Ralph Burton, taking possession of a camera that stood upon the piano. "I'm the photographer who is to take a picture of that window exhibit of Rhoda's when it is placed in the department store window, and I'm going to get a reporter friend of mine to write a corking good story, to go with the picture, that will appear within a few days on the front page of the Daily Argus—a story that will set all the people of the town to talking about the Polyglot Petition, and make them affix their signatures thereto."

"Good. Who will be next?" asked Phyllis.

"My stunt quite evidently will be to use Miss Rhoda's window exhibit as a text for a little talk I propose to give at the Epworth League next Sunday," said Robert Thompson. "I happen to be the leader that evening, and as it is to be a missionary meeting the Polyglot Petition is a very timely topic for consideration. With the help of some of the Methodist members of the Young People's Branch, who might bring along their fountain pens and a lot of blank petitions, I think we can get a hundred or so signatures, for we always have a crowd."

"Bob and I are going to take the world as our field," quietly remarked Betty Travis for herself and her brother. "Pretty nearly every section of the globe is represented at our University—China, Japan, the Philippines, India, Europe, South America, and Africa, and we'll have no difficulty in getting the signatures of all these different nationalities."

"My suggestion is very prosaic but practical withal," said Ruth Ralston. "I am on for a ten or fifteen minute talk at our Christian Endeavor Society next Sunday evening, and the subject is 'Temperance.' See what a fine opportunity it will give me to talk about the Polyglot Petition, and to stress our obligation as a Christian nation to lead the world in a great moral reform. I can imagine myself becoming almost eloquent as I picture the nations of the world watching eagerly, nay, anxiously our experiment in outlawing the liquor traffic, and speak of the responsibility that rests upon all Christians to aid in the enforcement of law, and to elect national and state law-makers who will stand by the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act, and will work and vote for enforcement legislation always and ever."

"We'd all like to come over to hear you, Ruth," said Addison Rounds. "We know you'll make a wonderful speech. I really believe we can use the Polyglot Petition to help us in arousing our fellow-citizens to enter whole-heartedly into the law enforcement campaign, and get ready for the coming critical election. I know there are a dozen or more others that would like to tell of their plans, but the hour is growing late, and I suggest they be put in writing and sent to the chairman of the committee, to be considered at our next meeting. We've had more than enough tonight to start us on our campaign."

"Of course there's only one way to close such an inspiring meeting as we have had," remarked Gladys Stone, "and that is to sing:

"'Wind the ribbon round the nations,
The nations of our God.'"

Greetings From China

My Dear Friends:

Nothing gives me greater pleasure than to write you this letter, which I intended to send a long time ago. Life in Y. P. B. work is very busy, as you know, and I often wonder if you, like myself, are so busily occupied day after day. Since coming back from the States, I have been traveling through most of the provinces in both South and Central China in the delightful company of Miss Christine I. Tinling, whom you all know and love. Besides interpreting for her in the places where my dialect is understood, I usually hold two to four meetings each day for the students, soldiers and the general public. My special mission is to get members. In order to do so, I usually present to my audiences the conditions threatening narcotic users in China. I appeal to them from the patriotic side as nothing is higher and nobler than patriotism, in the minds of our people. Through my organizing work, our membership has increased from about 1,000 to 4,000 since last fall. I feel God has been helping me every step I have taken.

To get them (our members) to keep up their interest in our work, we are having a written contest this fall. We have preliminary prizes in local places and we give the final prizes. This sort of thing is very appealing to our students. Some of the prizes are given by my friends in America, such as Mrs. G. H. Willard of Haddon Heights, New Jersey. Miss Tinling is helping us some. We hope more prizes will be secured later on.

I am now in the northern provinces. I have seen many famine stricken districts. The people are expecting to have a good crop this year. But still there are many who need help badly. The place where I am staying now is called Taiyuanfu, the capital city of Shansi province. I was in Ping Ting Hsieu and had a most successful time there. I was pleased to see the Majesty of the place sign up our pledge with his wife, and five more important officers in the court.

As I write, the day is shortening and I must get ready for tomorrow's meeting. I hope my letter will find you all, dear Y. P. B. workers, in sound health and at a successful time in your work.

Yours sincerely,
FRANCES WILLARD WANG

One-City-to-a-State Meeting in Connecticut Practical and Profitable

Ethel C. Plumb

Perfect weather, inspiring songs and much enthusiasm, made the conference at Hartford a great success. In the absence of our state president, Mrs. Mary B. Wilson, the chair was occupied by our beloved honorary state president, Mrs. Caroline B. Buell.

The guests of honor were Mrs. Deborah Knox Livingston, national director of Christian Citizenship, and Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger, national Americanization director. In a paper on the results of prohibition, read by our vice-president, Mrs. M. G. Puriton, she stated that the law was being much better enforced, especially among the foreign people, who constitute 85 per cent of Connecticut's population. There has been much decrease in drinking and six new savings banks have been opened in Bridgeport.

Judge Harrison B. Freeman, of New Haven, said that the Volstead Act had been a great success. No nation had ever passed a law like the Eighteenth Amendment, and we were somewhat handicapped in carrying it out at first, but it was beginning now to be more efficiently enforced. It will be a long fight, but a winning one, because politicians are afraid of organized women backed by votes.

Mrs. Livingston explained the Studies in Government series and urged all to use them. She said the Star-in-the-Window would call attention to the Constitution. Get the foreign and industrial women to study citizenship and hold citizenship "bees" similar to the old-fashioned "spelling bees". In giving helps for a meeting, she said success depends on the challenge of the program. Have the best that is possible, and use printed programs throughout the year.

A three-minute speech contest on Law Observance closed the afternoon session.

Monday evening a "George Washington dinner" was enjoyed by over one hundred guests, followed by short addresses by eminent speakers, Mrs. Mary E. Welles, state corresponding secretary, acting as toast mistress. Among those responding were Mrs. Livingston, Mrs. Vayhinger, Mrs. Herbert Knox Smith, president of the Connecticut League of Women Voters; Rev. R. H. Potter, president of the Connecticut Federation of Churches; Mr. James W. Hague, prohibition enforcement officer; Rev. Arthur E. Tarbell, superintendent of the Connecticut Temperance Union; and Mr. Herbert Hicks, field secretary of Christian Endeavor Societies. The Consumers League of Connecticut was represented by its president.

Tuesday morning a "round table" on making department plans practical was participated in by the state superintendents and many helpful, original and humorous ideas suggested.

Especially interesting was a demonstration of the trio team by Mrs. Dora E. W. Spratt, promoter of literature.

Comprehensive plans for the membership campaign were presented by our state treasurer, Mrs. Nellie Rule Arnold.

Mrs. Robertson of Portland told of her great success in winning the young people through love of them.

The address in the afternoon was given by Mrs. Vayhinger, who outlined plans of her correspondence course in Americanization and urged all present to take up the study. The need of help to the foreign mother, by means of mothers' comfort kits and babies' layettes was emphasized. Mrs. Vayhinger's presentation of the subject was exceedingly clear and held the close interest of the audience for over an hour.

Mrs. Dora Goodale told of her Loyal Temperance Legion work and made a plea for leaders for this important branch of our activities.

Mrs. Welles explained the Star-in-the-Window campaign and March 20 was designated as the day on which to display them in as many windows as possible.

A three-minute speech contest on the W. C. T. U. closed an exceedingly profitable conference.

New Jersey Regional Conference Enjoys Feast of Reason

Mrs. Mary S. Hathaway, Recording Secretary, Essex County W. C. T. U.

The New Jersey conference, held in the capital city, Trenton, was launched with an evening banquet in Hildebrecht's restaurant, where about one hundred or more women and a few men enjoyed the repast, which concluded with a feast of reason by representative women leaders of the Democratic, Republican, and Prohibition parties, the Federation of Women's Clubs, and the League of Women Voters. Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger, national director, made a plea for Americanization. Mayor Donnelly of Trenton, who was to greet us, was unable to keep his engagement, but offered his apology in person to the state president, Miss Esther H. Elfreth.

The conference proper was held in the First Presbyterian church and a strong program was presented. Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger, and Dr. Eva Lake discussed the subject of aliens or Americans; Mrs. Deborah Knox Livingston, law enforcement; Miss Ida Lillian Page, L. T. L. work; Mrs. J. H. Borton, temperance and missions; and Mrs. H. A. Frantz, president of Burlington county, the beneficial results of prohibition

The conference closed with a mass meeting in the evening, with addresses by Mrs. Vayhinger, Mrs. Livingston and others.

Fortunately, the state legislature was in session and some of the women availed themselves of this opportunity to hear discussion on bills of great interest to W. C. T. U. workers. The legislature, as already announced in THE UNION SIGNAL, has ratified the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution, the forty-sixth state to take such action.

Co-Operation Conference

Special Correspondence

One of the red letter days of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, has been the annual co-operation conference. The idea originated with H. Frances Jones, who presided at the meeting. The program arranged by her was one of unusual interest this year.

A large audience gathered at "The Willard" for the occasion. The devotional exercise, with Bible reading "service" by Mrs. Ida Hartman, the live-wire addresses from representatives of twelve organizations, the "World's Home Defenders,"—"The Ideal Home," Rev. Z. H. Copp, D. D.; Union College of the Orient, "Chemistry and Literature for Oriental Girls" by Miss Susan C. Lodge; Woman's Home Missionary Society, "Life Service"—Miss Winetta L. Stacks, were all greatly enjoyed. The fervent noontide prayer by the president, Mrs. Elizabeth R. Ferguson; The New Century Guild, "Women and Current Events," by Mrs. Ida Ellis Turner; the duet by Mrs. Frank Smith and Mrs. T. C. Welles, and the pretty recitation from The Young Crusader. "My Mother's Rose," by three year-old Maryanna Louise Tevis—and her singing "He Walks With Me," etc. were also enthusiastically received. A delightful luncheon was given by our dear Mrs. Mary H. Jones. Being unable to be present she sent the "wherewithal" for it. It was served by the efficient committee in pleasing fashion. The social hour was greatly enjoyed, new members secured and new interest awakened.

The afternoon session opened with a song service, Miss Mae Lynd and others taking part. Then came the young peoples' organizations—"Young People in Service" very ably given by Miss Hannah . Miller.

Other features of interest were addresses by representatives of the Associate Committee of Women on Police Matrons, "Need of Committee and Its Work" by Mrs. H. H. Hubbert, naming Mrs. Moorhead so long a member of the committee; the Federation of Churches, "Shall Christians Compete or Co-operate?" Rev. E. A. E. Palmsquist, D. D.; "Our W. C. T. U. Present Activities—The World's Convention in Philadelphia," Mrs. H. E. Fahnestock, county president. This was of unusual fervor and intense interest. The King's Daughters, "Aim and Achievements," Mrs. Fred Derby, Mrs. Elma Hutchins; with solo by Mrs. Hutchins. Wilson College, Summer School of Missions—"World's Fellowship," Miss Mary C. Peacock, daughter of dear Mrs. Peacock, our former president. The General Federation of Woman's Clubs—"The Way Out," Miss Imogene Oakley.

Each address was given in so able a manner that it was difficult to say which was best.

Illinois Unions Benefit by Regional Conference

Special Correspondence

The conference held in the Christian Church of Bloomington, Illinois, March 6-7, 1922, was an event of great interest. Rev. Higdon conducted the devotionals. When Miss Helen L. Hood, state president, stepped forward to give the key-note address, she was greeted by a large and enthusiastic audience. Earnest attention was given every speaker on the program. In the discussion on the desired increase in membership it was evident that the majority of the unions present were already engaged in a campaign to secure as many recruits as possible. The state treasurer, Mrs. L. Belle Goodman, reported that she had received several hundred more dollars in dues than at the same date last year.

The attractions of the afternoon and evening were the addresses of the national directors, Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger, Americanization, and Mrs. Laura Parks Miller, Women in Industry.

At the conference dinner the addresses of welcome by representatives of the Chamber of Commerce, Woman's Club, Ministerial Association and other organizations were filled with praise for the part our organization had in the banishment of liquor through the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution.

Helpful plans were presented at the round table, "How to make my Department Practical." by the two Branch secretaries of the state, Mrs. Minnie C. Coventry, Y. P. B., and Mrs. Lillie Billington, L. T. L., Mrs. Almena P. McDonald, superintendent of Health and Medical Temperance, and Mrs. Mary Edwards, of Publicity. We were fortunate in having with us Mrs. Rosalind Scott Dunkin, national director of Publicity, who gave a fine talk. Mrs. L. Belle Goodman brought out some new points in her drill on government, state and national. Mrs. Anna Green, president of Peoria county, urged the women to do their utmost to secure the election of dry officials.

Delightful music was furnished by local talent. The state was well represented in the attendance of four state officers, two Branch secretaries, three state superintendents and twelve county presidents. Nineteen counties sent representatives. The sentiment of all was that ours was a fine conference and that thanks were due "Mother National" for sending us such splendid and able women as speakers and helpers. The Bloomington unions did everything possible for the comfort and pleasure of the visitors.

One of the finest Willard memorial meetings I ever attended was held in Newport, about a hundred ladies gathering in the spacious home of Mrs. Warner Hare. Mrs. Dorsey was one of the speakers. Eight new members and a very good offering were received. At Paragould, another beloved white ribboner, Mrs. Yantis, known in the days of my L. T. L. secretaryship, was found active and enthusiastic. The Enemy

Frances S. Hallowes

(The S. S. "Persia" is bound for India, having among its passengers Major Orde and Bertram Harford, who have become acquainted with a Mrs. Carlyle, her small son, Eric, and Angela O'Connor, who, in the charge of Mrs. Carlyle, is on her way to marry a Deputy Commissioner at Seraneb. Harford, who is a total abstainer, is glad to note that Angela refuses to drink, and the two become good friends. Consequently, Harford is much shocked to learn that Angela has been induced by Mrs. Carlyle to take some whisky for seasickness and has been overcome by the liquor. Through pity for her he breaks his reticence on the subject, and tells her that both his parents were victims of drink, and that he had promised his mother on her deathbed never to touch alcohol in any form. Angela admits that she has made her mother a similar promise, but does not mention any particular reason therefor. One night, while his mother is at a bridge party, tiny Eric helps himself to her whisky, left out on the table in their cabin, and quickly becomes unconscious. He is discovered and cared for, but dies during the night and is buried at sea. At Bombay Angela is met by her fiance, Frank Fortescue, and the wedding takes place. After a long railroad journey they arrive at Seraneb. During the course of the first dinner in the new home, Fortescue urges wine upon his wife.)

CHAPTER VIII.

"Frank, I will drink your health in lemonade: that is quite as good."

"No, little woman, it is not. Do as I wish. See now," he said, holding up his glass, the golden liquid with the bubbles of light racing and sparkling upwards; "I drink to you, Angela! Health! Wealth! Happiness!"

Angela smiled, and looked round helplessly.

A water bottle stood near: she poured some of its contents into a glass, and holding it up, said "The same to you, dear Frank."

He frowned. "You owe me obedience first now, your mother comes second." Then he said to Divan peremptorily, "Fill this glass."

The servant filled it.

"Now, Angela, drink: here is your first opportunity for obedience!"

She flushed, and took the glass; her hand trembled so that some of the wine was spilled.

She put it to her lips, and with a wan smile repeated his words, "Health! Wealth and Happiness!"

"Drink it all!" he ordered.

She drank it reluctantly.

"That's a good girl! now is it not nice?"

"It is very delicious."

The liquid seemed to rush tingling through her veins, a deep color dyed her face, her eyes grew brighter.

"There, now, you see I know what you require; it is doing you good. Have another glass. Here, Divan, more wine for your mistress."

Angela drank a second glass. Her conscience gave her little trouble now. "After all, this is a special occasion, and champagne is not like whisky," she said to herself.

She grew quite hilarious and talkative, the shyness towards her husband melted away. She joked with him while he drank, his glass being re-filled many times.

"Now let us go into the verandah for a smoke," he said.

She laughed. "I don't smoke, but I will come with you."

She rose from her chair, and slightly reeled.

"I am quite giddy, Frank; give me your arm."

"Ah, that's all right!"

He steered her steps through the drawing room out into the flower-filled verandah. A clear sky was overhead, brilliant stars looked through the arches.

Fortescue put Angela into a long chair. "I'm glad you don't smoke, little woman; I hate to see a woman with stained finger tips and her complexion growing muddy, and her clothes reeking of tobacco smoke and stale scent. Pah! it is nauseous!"

Angela did not respond. The night air and the scent of flowers added to the fumes of the wine brought to her a kind of inertia. She lay still while her husband talked and smoked. Getting no reply after a while, he stooped over and found her in a drowsy state, on the verge of sleep.

"Wake up! Here's a whisky peg for you," as Divan came in with glasses.

"What, Frank! more drink! how can you? No, indeed, I cannot."

"Well, I'll let you off this; whisky is not woman's drink." He poured some out for himself, then suddenly he expelled violently the liquid from his mouth.

"Here, Divan, I say," he shouted.

"Huzoor."

"What is this abominable stuff you have brought me?"

"Huzoor, it is whisky, look at the bottle." The servant returned to the room and brought out the labelled whisky bottle.

"Yes, it looks right enough, but someone has been tampering with it. Have you been drinking, Divan?"

A cloud passed over the man's face.

"I never drink sharab, Huzoor!"

"Then who has? One of your niggers, I suppose."

"Huzoor! thy servant will make inquiries!" replied the man with dignity.

"Do, and look here, whoever has done this you must sack."

Divan salaamed and retired.

During this colloquy, Angela's drowsy eyes closed in sleep. She looked very fair, extended in the armchair partly in shadow and partly in light, the moon silvering her graceful robe and flashing jewels.

The clock struck eleven.

Fortescue got up and stood by Angela loking at her delicate recumbent figur in the moonlight.

"Innocent little darling!" he mused. " shall have little trouble in moulding he to my wishes; she is of a nervous an shrinking temperament, I see: just wha I like in a woman. None of your sel willed women for me."

"Come, my enchanted angel, away t your bower!" He put his strong arm around her, and clasping her to hin almost carried her into her dressin room.

Ah, Frank Fortescue, why did not son good angel warn you in this momen Why was the future of your innocen young wife hidden from you? Was that you were too dwarfed and shrunke in soul to hear the voice of that spir which is ever seeking to find respon in man's heart, to warn, to defend, save?

Divan Singh, the black-bearded se vant, whose impressive personality h struck Angela, was a Christian, co verted from Mohammedanism as a you man, and he had persevered in t Christian faith. His wife, Maryam, w the widow of a native Christian pas when he married her. She was a markable woman, some years older th himself, with a very sweet and no character. He loved and revered h she had great influence for good o him, and with her help he had develop into a consistent disciple of Christ, a zealous for the Kingdom of God. was instant in season and out of sea in bringing the Gospel to his fello

All his spare time was spent in acts of mercy and love towards dark men and women around him.

Fortescue had found him as a kitmatgar, a man to be trusted, and though he had no sympathy with his Christianity, he let him go his own way, exacting only absolute obedience. By degrees he had raised him from being kitmatgar to the oversight of his whole establishment.

Divan Singh engaged and dismissed the servants and was responsible for the right doing of all. He paid all wages and kept his master informed of what went on in the compound.

It was not an easy life for the man. The servants, although they called him "Master," were often surly and jealous, and suspected him as a Christian. But his unfailing good temper and uniform desire to see the best in them caused them to respect him notwithstanding.

His duties over for the night, the salaams to the Sahib and Mem Sahiba paid, with a heavy heart and a sad countenance, Divan Singh repaired to his house. This house was but a single room, one of a row which comprised the servants' quarters in the compound. Small and bare, with no furniture but boxes, string bedsteads and a few shelves, it had yet an air of comfort and cleanliness, and there was some brightness in the shining brass vessels, and the few colored prints and texts which were pinned up against the white-washed wall.

Divan Singh scarcely touched the food placed before him on the ground by his wife.

"Why is my husband sorrowful?" she asked. "Is this not a day of joy when the Mem Sahiba has come to shed her beauty on her Sahib and on her servants?"

"Oh Maryam, the heart of thy husband is sore for our new Mem Sahiba."

"Tell me then, Divan, what thou meanest? Is she not beautiful and rich and as a good Sahib?"

"She is but a young woman, oh wife! and I see much pain, much trouble to come to my Sahib's house."

He covered his head and groaned deeply.

"Tell me, my husband, what is this which ails you? You talk in riddles!"

"Listen then, oh wife! The Sahib called for his best wine. 'Drink, oh beloved one,' he said to the Mem Sahiba. She answered, 'No! no!' Again he said to his servant, 'Pour out the wine for the Mem Sahiba.' The Mem clasped her hands and said, 'Please! please do not give me of this wine; I cannot drink it; I promised my mother that I would not.' 'I am your husband and you must obey,' replied the Sahib."

Divan groaned again.

"And she drank the sharab?" (wine).

"Yes, the wicked water, one, two glasses; and her eyes shone and her tongue talked! Oh Maryam, it is bad for her; she will fall by it. Thy husband sees trouble in the future."

A FEW OUTSTANDING THOUGHTS AT THE NATIONAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION SUPERINTENDENCE MEETING HELD IN CHICAGO RECENTLY

"A little more light for the common man this year, next year, a hundred years from now, and the battle for humanity, for democracy and for brotherhood is won." —Wm. C. Bagley, Columbia University.

"We must try to co-operate, understanding each other's ideals, getting that kind of outlook on life which will enable us to talk together and reason together instead of fighting together." —Frank Aydelotte, President Swarthmore College.

"More than half of the teachers in the public schools of the United States have inadequate education and professional training." —George D. Strayer, Professor of Educational Administration, Columbia University.

"Nothing promotes educational progress in a general way better than legislation affecting our schools." —John J. Tigert, U. S. Commissioner of Education.

"Educators should avoid waste which has marked the history of other new teaching devices and proceed at once to give the educational film the kind of intensive scientific study that will bring the most fruitful results. The film should furnish both intellectual stimulation and satisfaction." —Dr. Frank N. Freeman of the School of Education, University of Chicago.

"Drunkards Will Be Patriots"

Trust the brewer to keep his eye on the main chance!

Just now he is making a suggestion that he hopes will bring back beer and wine to those friends of alcohol who value their "personal liberty" above their good health and clear brain. He wants Congress to pass a soldier bonus bill and let him provide the funds to pay the bonus by legalizing the sale of beer and wine and putting on the sale sufficient excise to cover the bonus requirements. Some important wet publications are supporting him heroically.

It is an ingenuous proposal, but will deceive no one. Its intention is so obvious that large groups of ex-service men are incensed over it and already have repudiated it. One popular New York press humorist comments on it in these words: "Under the booze sales tax system every drink you take helps 'our boys' even if it doesn't help you. If you couldn't fight for your country, drink for it now. Food won the war, drink will win the bonus. We hold no brief for either bootlegger or prohibition. But if this plan whizzes through Congress, every drink makes you a better American. And the drunkards will be the patriots!"

The American Federation of Labor has joined in the cry for beer and wine. Its Executive Council has issued a long declaration addressed to the American people, in which it says that, after a long investigation, it has decided the Volstead Act "must be modified so as to permit the manufacture and sale of beer and light wine."

There is a tremendous fight on prohibition in process of development. In many ways it is the most sinister and determined in the whole history of the temperance struggle. Money and brains will be behind it. It will take not only money and brains, but a determination equal to that of the liquor interests, to defeat it. There can be no half-hearted support now on the part of the friends of prohibition. You must be for prohibition or against it, and you must show your colors. —Christian Herald.

Give prohibition time, says a dry enforcement official. The better way would be to give the bootleggers "time" in jail.

Trio Team Testimony

BARTON COUNTY, KANSAS, is No. 4 on the Trio Team County Honor Roll, writes the president of the Kansas W. C. T. U., Mrs. Lillian Mitchner, and our records sustain this report.

NEW YORK'S president strongly recommends to local unions that the first contribution taken from the budget money should be for a year's subscription to THE UNION SIGNAL for president, secretary and treasurer.

PENNSYLVANIA is planning to give New York a merry race. It is now No. 2, and New York No. 1 in subscriptions. Pennsylvania, the hostess state for the World's Convention next November, is planning to literally sow the big state with SIGNALS.

COLORADO'S president is urging the district organizations (it has no county unions) to try for the honor of being listed on the Trio Team County Honor Roll. What Colorado attempts, she usually accomplishes.

In MINNESOTA the Trio Team plan is proving very popular an effective. Mrs. Josie Sizer, state president, writes that wherever she presents the plan, she leaves in her wake a trail of Trio Team subscriptions.

ILLINOIS made the greatest net gain in subscriptions in February, and has placed one of her counties—(Boone)—on the county honor roll.

IOWA stands near the head of the class, and has contributed to the Honor Roll the first "Trio Team Triumphant" County—Jackson.

INDIANA. A letter from the state president asking to have samples sent to all state institutes, says, "I shall hold all the above institutes and will push THE UNION SIGNAL. Indiana is putting UNION SIGNAL promoters in every county."

TRIO TEAM COUNTY HONOR ROLL

1. Jackson County, Iowa
2. Grady County, Georgia
3. Boone County, Illinois
4. Barton County, Kansas

MAINE at its Waterville institute last month gave much attention to the Trio Team plan for THE UNION SIGNAL, and many unions reported that they had complied with the suggestion that all three officers take the paper.

GEORGIA is alert on the Trio Team plan. The state president writes: "I shall be delighted to have sample copies of THE UNION SIGNAL for distribution at institutes, for I do feel that if our women will subscribe for and read THE UNION SIGNAL, our work will grow and we shall gain our quota of the Million Members."

NEBRASKA'S president has sent out questions to each local and county union president, asking how many Trio Teams have subscribed for THE UNION SIGNAL, and is to publish the results in the state paper.

WISCONSIN made the largest net gain in January. Its state promoter makes the following suggestions in the latest state paper:

"Wisconsin will stand a fair chance of winning the prize of the electric lamp, which is offered by the National, if the unions will take advantage of the two following means:

"First—Will the local and county presidents strive to gain the five dollar prize which is offered by the state superintendent to each for obtaining the largest number of subscriptions to THE UNION SIGNAL?

"Second—Will the county presidents strive to secure the subscriptions to THE UNION SIGNAL for each of their unions, for the Trio Teams, and by so doing have their names on the roll of honor in THE UNION SIGNAL? Who will be the first on the honor roll?"

TENNESSEE'S president urges in its state paper: "The National W. C. T. U. is asking that every local union president, secretary and treasurer—the Trio Team—take THE UNION SIGNAL. If these three officers are not able financially to do it, the union should raise the money and subscribe for it for them. No worker can afford to be without it, but these three leaders should have it in order to intelligently lead the work in their community."

OKLAHOMA in its state paper says: "Be sure to adopt the Trio Team plan and help put your county on the T. T. roll. Oklahoma should have several such counties."

NORTH DAKOTA, through Mrs. Barbara H. Wylie, state corresponding secretary, writes, "The Trio Teams are becoming more and more interested in THE UNION SIGNAL and we hope that soon they may all be running 'by SIGNAL Steam.'" At the mid-year executive THE UNION SIGNAL Trio Team plan was given a prominent place on the program.

Farmer Not a Loser Through Prohibition

"If it is true that the Volstead Law is ruining the farmers, why do they furnish the largest majorities for prohibition whenever the question comes to a vote?" is an inquiry frequently made these days. Those who know say that there is no foundation for the statement that the farmer has been deprived of his best customer in the passing of the breweries. The Anheuser-Busch Company, now manufacturing a dozen lines of soft drinks and food products, is but one of numerous concerns that purchase from the farmer the products previously used in making liquor. The fact that the Anheuser-Busch Company last year paid the Federal government nearly $1,000,000 in sales tax alone, shows the volume of business being done, from which the farmer naturally profits. "Dollar for dollar, the American farmer has received back in double measure the money he may have lost directly or indirectly as a result of prohibition," recently asserted Charles S. Barrett, Washington representative of the National Board of Farm Organizations, in refuting the claim of Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, that agriculture has suffered through prohibition.

In my opinion it is difficult to overestimate the value of national prohibition to our people in Delaware. Certainly conditions are much better under national and state prohibition laws.
William D. Denney,
Governor of Delaware.

Prohibition has proven a great blessing to the people of Arizona since it became effective in January, 1915, and during that period the state has witnessed a most remarkable growth.
T. E. Campbell,
Governor of Arizona.

There is no doubtful quality in the public's attitude on the saloon. They are done with it and in my opinion, nothing could induce them to return to the conditions to which prohibition put an end.
Harry L. Davis,
Governor of Ohio.

Who Would Vote to Bring It Back?

"The liquor traffic was destructive of much that was precious in American life. In the face of so much evidence on that point, what conscientious man would want to let his own selfish desires influence him to vote to bring it back? In another generation I believe that liquor will have disappeared from our memories."

—Warren G. Harding,
President of the United States.

(The above statement was quoted as having been made by Mr. Harding in a pre-election speech. The President has said he has no objection to having it known that it represents his views.)

I can see nothing but permanency for the movement which has wiped out the menace of the saloon. Prohibition has proven itself an economic benefit in many more ways than one.
Ben W. Olcott,
Governor of Oregon.

Prohibition has been successful in Utah to the extent that it has eliminated the saloon and attendant evils. It has improved business conditions, bettered the wage earner, and brought about more favorable moral conditions in general.
Charles R. Mabey,
Governor of Utah.

Prohibition is successful in New Hampshire because it has closed all the saloons and some jails; has lessened crime and poverty; has made good, industrious citizens out of loafers and drunkards; and has removed temptation from our boys and girls.
Albert O. Brown,
Governor of New Hampshire.

RATIFICATION OF TREATIES COMPLETED—HOUSE ANTI-MORPHINE BILL OUT OF COMMITTEE—BILL FOR DEPORTATION OF ALIEN VIOLATORS OF PROHIBITION ACT APPROVED—CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT FOR SIX-YEAR PRESIDENTIAL TERM PROPOSED—CAMPS TO BECOME REFORMATORIES—ACTION ON AUSTRIAN DEBT COMPLETED—ARMY TO BE REDUCED — TREATIES RECOMMENDED TO PREVENT RUM SMUGGLING—ALIENS TO REMAIN

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

Ratification of Treaties Completed

The Senate this week completed the ratification of the six treaties negotiated at the Conference for Limitation of Armament, consideration of which by the Senate began March 2.

THE SUPPLEMENTARY TREATY to the Four-Power Pact, exempting the home islands of Japan from the operation of the main treaty on Pacific insular possessions and dominions, was ratified by a unanimous vote of 73 to 0.

THE FIVE POWER TREATY, limiting naval armament, was ratified by a vote of 74 to 1, Senator France of Maryland casting the only negative vote. This treaty means America will join Great Britain, Japan, France and Italy in a ten year naval holiday and will scrap war craft to establish the fleet ratio 5-5-3—1-75—1-75. After three days of debate the pact was ratified as presented. This action of the United States Senate gave the unqualified assent of this country to the first successful effort in the history of the world to limit armament.

Swiftly following the naval treaty, the Senate with great speed ratified the treaty prohibiting the USE OF POISON GAS and RESTRICTING THE USE OF THE SUBMARINE in naval warfare. The vote was 71 to 0.

The treaty relating to principle and policy in matters concerning China, popularly known as the OPEN DOOR POLICY, was ratified 66 to 0.

THE NINE-POWER TREATY, relating to Chinese customs tariff, was ratified by a vote of 58 to 1, Senator King of Utah alone voting in the negative.

With the Four-Power Pact, ratified last week, this completes the six treaties. The United States is the first of the signatory nations to ratify the treaties. Already the Department of State has sent notes, expressing the readiness of the United States to exchange ratification of the treaties with the eight nations which participated in the Washington Conference. The notes will be delivered by American diplomatic officials in Great Britain, France, Italy, Belgium, Japan, China, Portugal, and the Netherlands. Before the treaties can be actually enforced, ratification or approval by the foreign powers concerned must be secured.

House Anti-Morphine Bill Reported Out of Committee

H. R. 2193, known as the Miller Anti-Morphine Bill, has been reported out of Committee. The bill provides for an amendment to the present law, prohibiting the importation and use of opium for other than medicinal purposes.

There are evidences today, we are informed by missionaries, travelers and newspaper correspondents, that the situation as relates to drugs, especially in China, is alarming. Statistics show that the deadly habit of drug-taking is on the increase, and that there are good reasons for alarm is seen in customs reports in this country, which show that within the short period of five months enough morphine and opium were shipped from the one port of Seattle to give a dose to each of the 400,000,000 men, women and children in China.

The proposed legislation by Congressman Miller of Washington should have the united and hearty support of all white ribboners. The bill is on the House calendar and, if you make known your interest to your Congressmen, the bill will be passed. Write at once, asking support of H. R. 2193.

Committee Approval of Bill For Deportation of Violators of Prohibition Act

Representative Johnson of Washington is sponsor for the bill which has just been favorably reported to the House to provide for deportation of aliens convicted of violating the Federal and state prohibition and narcotic laws. It is H. R. 11058.

Constitutional Amendment Proposed For Six-Year Term for President and to Abolish the Electoral College

Representative Wood of Indiana has introduced a resolution proposing a constitutional amendment providing for the election of President and Vice President for six-year terms.

The electoral college system would be abolished and the candidate receiving the largest aggregate vote would become President, the one receiving the next highest number automatically becoming Vice President. The President would be ineligible for reelection.

The first election under the system suggested by the bill would be on the first Tuesday in October, 1925, the candidate elected to assume office a month later. The bill also proposes four-year terms for representatives, the senatorial term to remain six years.

Camps to be Converted into Reformatories

President Harding has approved a plan of the Attorney General to convert certain Army cantonments into vocational reformatory training schools for first offense persons between the ages of 18 and 30, now in Federal prisons.

The Attorney General has indicated that Camp Grant will probably be used for this purpose and has estimated that between 400 and 500 men now in prisons will be eligible for admittance to reformatory schools. Authorization to carry out this plan would have to be given by Congress.

Congress Completes Action on Austrian Debt

A joint resolution already adopted by the Senate, authorizing a twenty-five year extension for payment by Austria of the $25,000,000 for flour purchased through the United States grain corporation, has been adopted by the House. This completes congressional action on the extension of time for the Austrian debt.

House Greatly Reduces Size of Army

The House has passed the Army Appropriation Bill, carrying a total of $288,000,000 and directing that by July 1, next, the enlisted strength of the Army shall be reduced to 115,000 men and the number of officers decreased to 11,000.

Opposition to this big reduction in the strength of the Army is already presenting itself in the Senate, but friends of big reduction will continue the fight there.

Treaties Recommended to Aid in Preventing Rum Smuggling into This Country

Prohibition Commissioner Haynes advocates negotiation of treaties with Great Britain and Cuba to aid in preventing rum smuggling into this country.

Would Make Ships Pirates

Prohibition officials have also under discussion a proposal for declaring rum-running vessels to be pirates, through negotiation with foreign nations looking to the cancellation of the registry of such ships.

Many of the larger liquor ships carrying illicit cargoes of alcohol, it was said, anchor just outside the limit of customs jurisdiction and send the cargo ashore in small boats.

The war upon these craft is being successfully waged, officials asserted, but the cargo vessels are beyond the reach of the law.

Executive Order Permits Aliens to Remain

The Congress recently passed an act which provides for the admission into the United States of the aliens concerned without regard to the provisions of the general law restricting immigration.

In accordance with this act, Commissioner General Husband of the Immigration Bureau has announced that approximately 2,500 aliens, admitted into the United States under temporary permits which would expire March 23 and leave them liable to immediate deportation have been given an indefinite extension of time for their stay.

In practically all cases the aliens concerned, who represent almost every nationality and in addition have a percentage of Asiatics among their number, such as Syrians, Armenians and Turks, were landed in the United States after the legal number of individuals of their nationalities admissible to the United States had been exhausted.

The immigrants, after their release from detention at the port of arrival scattered over the United States, and the cost of reassembling them for deportation as well as the humanitarian objections to sending them back to the countries of departure, have induced the enactment of the special legislation.

Would End Disappointments

Commissioner Husband, in cooperation with the Senate Committee on Immigration, has practically completed preparation of amendments to the pending general immigration bill, designed to extend the provisions of the existing quota law. These amendments are directed to eliminate situations such as the one which occasioned the executive order.

ANALYST FINDS ALCOHOLIC DEATHS DIMINISHED UNDER PROHIBITION

By Henry Rood, in New York World, March 26

In former years under the liquor license system deaths from alcohol in New York City were between 400 and 00 per cent. more numerous than in 920 or in 1921 under Prohibition.

This statement is made on the authority of official figures compiled by he Bureau of Vital Statistics, New 'ork City Health Department. Coming from such source, it is not unlikely to prove a surprising disclosure to hat portion of the public which has aken it for granted that under existng prohibition restrictions the alcoolic death rate is much heavier than was in days when beers, wines and ard liquors were easily obtainable.

Directly contrary to such a widely ccepted opinion, however, the Health)epartment statistics apparently show hat since the Prohibition Amendment ent into effect and since agencies for xecuting the Volstead Enforcement Act ere organized—this taking a considrable part of the year 1919—there has een a decline in the alcoholic death ate in New York City of extraordinary roportions.

In order to grasp the full signifiance of official figures as set forth n the accompanying table, it is necesary to compare vital statistics as they ave been in 1920 and 1921, under Proibition, with corresponding conditions hich existed during former years of cense. It will be seen, at first glance, hat in 1916 deaths from all forms of lcoholism numbered 690. The next ear, 1917, this total dropped from 690 o 570. A principal reason for the sudden decrease may be found in the fact hat many thousands of men, especially n the latter part of 1917, were in army amps and naval stations where the d was clamped down as tight as possile, and where infraction of military or aval regulations brought immediate unishment.

In 1918 corresponding conditions prevailed, and to much greater extent, for hat year saw some millions of Americans under military and naval discipline in this country and abroad, of whom New York contributed its proportionate share, and a large share.

Therefore, if we are to consider the Health Department's figures from an unprejudiced standpoint it seems fair to fix upon the year 1916 as the last year when license prevailed for the manufacture, transportation and open sale of alcoholic beverages. And since agencies for enforcing the Volstead Act were organized by necessarily slow degrees during 1919, it seems only fair and square to consider 1920 as the first year when Prohibition really was put on trial before the supreme court of public opinion.

Health Department Alcoholism Data

Year	Alcoholism	Wood Alcohol	Alcohol Poison'g	Total
1910	621	6	8	635
1911	636	6	2	644
1912	570	4	3	577
1913	656	3	2	661
1914	660	5	—	665
1915	562	1	2	565
1916	687	2	1	690
1917	560	8	2	570
1918	252	4	1	257
1919	176	38	1	215
1920	 98	29	—	127
1921	119	14	8	141

I am not in favor of amending the Volstead Act in respect to the amount of permissible alcohol in beverages. I am not in favor of allowing light wines and beer to be sold under the Eighteenth Amendment. I believe it would defeat the purpose of the amendment. No such distinction as that between wines and beer on the one hand and spirituous liquors on the other is practicable as a police measure. Any such loophole as light wines and beer would make the amendment a laughing stock.

—Chief Justice William H. Taft.

Looking carefully at the Health Department's table, it appears that in the last year of full license (1916) deaths from alcohol, in New York City, were more than 500 per cent. greater than deaths from the same causes in 1920, the first year of Prohibition. In 1916 there were 690 such deaths; in 1920 the number had dropped to 127. The year 1921 showed a total of 141 deaths —an increase of 14.

It is interesting to note that the number of persons who died from "alcoholic poisoning" in 1921 was exactly the same as the number who died from such cause or causes in 1910, before Federal Prohibition was seriously considered as a possibility except of the remote future. In 1920 there was not a single death from "alcohol poisoning" in New York; which seems to indicate that Prohibition has nothing whatever to do with such accidental dosing of alcohol which the Health Department terms "alcoholic poisoning" to differentiate it from ordinary alcoholism.

In the seven years of "full" license, from 1910 to 1916, inclusive, there was a total of 4,437 deaths from alcoholism, wood alcohol and "alcohol poisoning" in New York City, an average of approximately 634 per year. In 1920 and 1921, when Prohibition was more or less enforced, there was a total of 268 deaths, or an average of 134 per year, as against 634 in former years—a decrease of some 500 per annum.

When Prohibition restrictions began to go into effect in 1919 there were 38 deaths from wood alcohol. Through ceaseless efforts of newspapers the public was so thoroughly warned of attendant dangers that deaths from wood alcohol decreased from 38 in 1919 to 29 in the year 1920, and showed still further decrease, to 14, in the year just closed—only 8 more in 1921 than in 1910, when all kinds of alcoholic beverages were plentiful.

Regardless of whether one is in favor of the Prohibition Amendment and the Volstead Act, or opposed thereto, these figures from official records of the Bureau of Vital Statistics are worth serious consideration.

Prohibition Beneficial to Women and Children, Says San Francisco Club Woman

"Has prohibition proved of any special benefit to the women of America?" Has it had any marked beneficial effect on home life and social environment?" These were the questions recently asked of the club women of San Francisco by the Women's Prohibition Investigation Council of Sydney, Australia, according to the San Francisco Examiner. In answer to the communication, which was read at a special meeting of the civic department of the California Club, Mrs. Hamilton Riggins, chairman, sent over the waters the one word, "Yes".

"Seven distinct questions, all bearing upon the effect of national prohibition in America, were submitted," says the Examiner. "Mrs. Riggins stated that in answering them she sought the expert advice of J. C. Astredo of the juvenile court, Katherine Felton of the Associated Charities, Mrs. L. M. Culver of the women's court, and J. M. McCurrie of the Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

"Categorically the questions and answers are as follows:

"Has prohibition proved of any special benefit to women?

"Has it had any marked effect on home life and social environment?

"Ans.—We strongly feel that it has. Yes. Effect on home life generally beneficial.

"What effect has prohibition had upon charities and corrections?

"Ans.—A marked effect in reducing the number of dependent and indigent persons in the community.

Tells of Saloon

"In touching upon the open saloon, Miss Felton of the Associated Charities said:

"'Immediately upon closing our open saloons, the change became notable. The open saloon of the United States has always been known as the "poor man's club," and the prohibition law immediately cut off that avenue for drink. As a result men reached their homes with all their daily, weekly or monthly wage untouched. Instantly the change was noticeable. The improvement in children was marked; little cheeks rounded out; children were better dressed, luncheons more adequate to the children's necessities were available, and anxious, weakly little ones found light and happiness coming into their lives.

"'Prohibition has been a great stimulus to thrift. With the passing of the open saloon thrift began to invade the household. I want to point out that in the city of San Francisco the school children have in the banks of the city $1,500,000.

"'Poverty and crime has lessened by more than 50 per cent.

"'Watching the mark of improvement in children and homes, I feel safe to say that should the question of a return to the open saloon in our cities and towns throughout the United States be put to a vote, the citizens of the United States would defeat it by a two-thirds majority.'"

POSTER LESSON: SMALL ACCIDENTS THAT MIGHT HAPPEN TO YOU

Cora Frances Stoddard

(May be used with the poster of this title for public school or Sunday school lesson material. See page 13.)

Aim: To show the advantage of sobriety in preventing accidents and the losses due to them; that prohibition promotes workmen's safety.

The work of the world is done largely by machinery. Refer to the rapid development of the use of machinery, the cotton gin, power weaving machines, the steam engine, electrical motors, farm machinery.

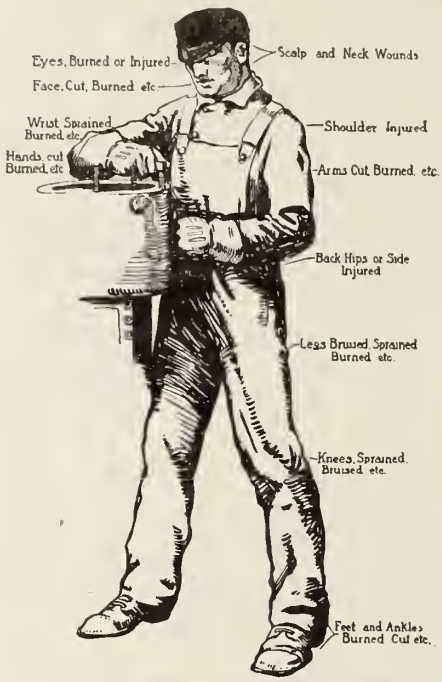
Machinery involves more danger to the worker than old-time hand work because (1) it operates faster with more power; (2) it brings large numbers of workers together who may cause injury to one another.

Show from the figure on the poster the many kinds of accidents that may occur during work.

Modern industry tries to prevent accidents by (1) safety devices; (2) teaching workers to be careful. (The National Safety Council, Chicago, has good literature for elaborating this point if desired.)

Safe men as well as safe machinery are necessary. The most carefully protected machinery or the best rules for safety will not make the worker safe from accident unless he obeys the rules, thinks what he is doing, and uses his wits to avoid accident. The careless worker may injure not only himself, but also his fellow-workers.

Alcoholic drinks increase danger from accident. The alcohol that all these drinks contain makes one who uses them liable to accident because (1) it takes the edge off mental keenness, making him more careless and likely to take dangerous chances he would not take if his mind were entirely clear; (2) it dulls alertness in recognizing a danger or its seriousness; (3) it makes one less able to decide quickly and correctly the best action to take in an emergency (illustrations of such emergencies can be drawn from experiences of engineers and chauffeurs, the emergencies of factory belts, dies, knives, of farm tractors and mowing machines); (4) alcohol makes one less able to protect himself in dangerous places.



Insured drinkers had 3 1-5 times as many small accidents as the average insured worker. Sobriety Boosts Safety.

One does not have to be drunk to have an accident caused by alcohol. The mental confusion due to so-called moderate amounts of alcohol is a more frequent cause of accident than actual drunkenness; the drunken man is neither able nor permitted to stay around dangerous machinery.

Drinkers had more accidents than the average insured worker.

No general statistics have been kept in the United States as to the comparative number of accidents among drinkers and non-drinkers. Some German workmen's benefit societies did keep careful records about accidents to their members. The poster gives the facts.

The "drinkers" were men who had so poisoned themselves with the alcohol in the liquors they drank that the insurance doctors recorded them as chronic drinkers.

These men had 3 1/5 times as many small accidents as the average workman insured in the society. That is, among 1,000 steady drinkers there were 350 accidents, to every 100 among 1,000 workmen as a whole.

(In the classroom this comparison may be illustrated by drawing on the blackboard two bars, one 3 1/2 times as long as the other. Label the longer one, "The hard drinkers' accident rate"; the shorter one, "The average workers' accident rate.")

These accidents were the less serious ones that kept the injured man away from work less than four weeks.

(In schools let pupils work out the money loss in wages to the worker if his own drink or that of a fellow-worker lays him up with an accident for three days, a week, two weeks, or a month.)

Many states have laws compelling employers to "compensate" workers injured, that is, to pay some amount that will help cover the expenses of the accident and the wages lost. Under these laws the employer had no protection against accident due to drinking by an employe. After he had tried to make working conditions safe, a drinker made careless or dull by drink might cause an accident to himself or to somebody else and the employer had to pay the cost.

This relation of alcoholic drinks to accidents was one reason why:

1. Railroads would not employ drinkers in operating trains.
2. Drinkers could not get work at all in some plants.
3. Drinkers were the "last to be hired and the first to be fired" in other plants.
4. Many employers wanted prohibition to protect their workmen against danger due to alcohol.
5. Many sober workmen wanted prohibition to help protect them from the danger of accidents caused by drinking workmen.

HOW CANDIDATES ARE NOMINATED

Deborah Knox Livingston

It has been well said that the time for a citizen to investigate the record and character of a candidate for office is before he is nominated. The nomination of candidates for public office is one of the most serious functions of the voter. It is the privilege as well as the duty of every voter to have a voice in the selection of the candidates who are to represent him in the government.

The importance of nominating only such candidates as are held in high esteem by their fellow citizens cannot be too strongly emphasized. There has been in the past too much power given the corrupt politician in dictating the party nominations, and this in large measure has been due to the apathy and indifference shown in these matters by the average voter. Until the individual voter has been made to feel his personal responsibility in nominating the candidates of his party, there is not much hope for the establishment of Christian ideals in government, by party action.

Whenever a candidate for public office seeks the support of the voters of his district, two questions should be asked concerning him: first, is he a man of integrity and unquestioned moral character; and second, has he the ability to successfully perform the duties of the office to which he aspires. Character and ability should constitute the "acid test" for every candidate who aspires to public office.

Our present party organizations came into being largely in order that certain groups might control the selection of candidates, and the nomination and election of candidates is still the central activity of all party organizations. In many instances the groups familiarly known as "the machine," have used their power either for personal gain or party preferment rather than for the best interests of the state. It is well for us to remember that political parties are simply large groups of citizens who agree concerning certain policies in government and who act together in the nomination and election of officials whose duty it is to carry out these policies.

There are two ways by which candidates are nominated; the first is known as the primary, sometimes called the direct method; the second way is by the action of party conventions. In the majority of states, the direct method of nomination candidates has been adopted, while a few states still cling to the convention method.

There is still a great deal of discussion as to the value of the primary method, and in some states where it has been tried out there has been dissatisfaction and attempts have been made to repeal the law. The outstanding value of the primary method is that each voter has the opportunity to select his own party candidate and does not leave the selection to representatives of his party, as is the case in the convention method. The supporters of the primary method argue that it is the more democratic method.

The method most commonly used by which the names of available candidates are placed before the people is the one known as a primary petition. This petition contains the names of the voters

UN BIEN VIAJE!

(A GOOD JOURNEY)

Anna Adams Gordon

Over a scenic route of rare beauty one journeys by rail southward from Mexico City to Vera Cruz. Not many hours after leaving Mexico City's high altitude, we are in tropical climate. Coffee, banana and orange groves—a pleasing panorama—prove an agreeable change from central Mexico's vast pulque plant areas. Stations along the way, crowded with motley throngs of Mexicans, provide moving pictures that contain much food for thought in connection with the relation of the forty-eight United States of America to the twenty-nine United States of Mexico.

Eighty Per Cent of Mexico's Population Illiterate

In stressing universal education as absolutely essential, the Obregon government surely is on the right track. Eighty per cent of Mexico's population are now illiterate. In conjunction with the National University of Mexico, the government issues monthly for free distribution, a pamphlet entitled "El Maestro" (The Master). The scope of this magazine is broadly international. In the leading article of the first issue, Dr. Vasconcelos, Mexico's Minister of Education, defines its purpose—"To spread useful knowledge among all the people of the Republic."

To Educate the Masses of the People More Important Than to Develop Geniuses

"Its columns," he writes, "will be open to all noble and fruitful ideas, and in no case will they be at the service of any party or any group; but at the service of the nation as a whole. The sole principle that will serve as our guide in the selection of material for our monthly is the conviction that culture is worthless, ideas are worthless, art is worthless, unless they are all inspired by the common interest in humanity, seeking to achieve the relative welfare of all human beings, assuring liberty and justice, which are indispensable if all are to develop their potentialities—in the light of the noblest conceptions. To educate the mass of the populace is much more important than to create geniuses, since in reality the genius is worth little unless it be through his capacity to regenerate the multitude."

"No Nation Can Reach Its Ideal of Culture and Civilization While It Tolerates Bull-Fights and Pulque."

"The vast majority of our fellow-men can neither read nor write," pleads Dr. Vasconcelos, "and the fault is ours who can do both. As soon as you receive this review, which the government presents to you for your personal instruction, you ought to offer to your fellow-men the learning they desire. Hasten to solicit from the National University your appointment as honorary instructor, and with it, or without it, begin to teach all who need your teachings, how to read. This review is published for the majority, but it has interest for all, and should interest all. Therefore, the cultured spirits should read it, in the light of their refinement, with spiritual generosity, understanding that a nation and a culture cannot be improvised, and that they, more than any others, are obliged to contribute with their greater penetration to popular education." With Senor Vasconcelos as Minister of Education, Mexico ought to make rapid, encouraging progress up the "hill of learning." This educational leader recently declared that no nation can reach its ideal of culture and civilization while it tolerates bull fights and pulque.

"Norther" Changes Plans

Arriving in the early evening, at the quaint old city of Vera Cruz, it was a joy to find at the station gate, smiling a cordial welcome, the directora of the Instituto Morelos, Miss Turner, and her associate, Miss Taylor. These young women from our own Southland are connected with the Presbyterian educational work of Vera Cruz. A few minutes later, in a typical Mexican hotel facing the pretty plaza, our three-day program was quickly mapped out. During the night a "norther" swooped down upon us and the first day's plans had to be set aside as a stiff gale from the gulf was too strong to be faced. The quiet day in the hotel was utilized in writing to many friends in many lands, and—yes, I'll have to confess that I frequently stepped out on the balcony to see if by any chance the gulf was quieting down.

Little Mexicans Sing Temperance Marching Songs

The following day, the wind having abated, the conference arranged by our Presbyterian friends at the Institute was well attended by an invited group of Mexican and "foreign" women—most cultured and charming. A musical program by some of the younger children of the Institute gave me a delightful surprise. Fancy hearing these little Mexicans sing in Spanish with great enthusiasm, my old familiar "Marching Songs"—"The Temperance Train," "Make a Temperance Chain" and "The Bobolink's Temperance Song." Vera Cruz women will do their splendid part in the temperance activities of Mexico.

Life at the Imperial Hotel in Vera Cruz is simplified for English and American guests by a menu in English, as well as in Spanish. A few of the edible attractions which I sampled, were "Swollen omelet," "Boiled eggs (any tenderness)," "Chicken roasted or stewed, (undiminished)", "Ham or bacon on eggs!" A rather startling dish which perhaps I ought to have tried, was "Brains with black butter."

The third day in Vera Cruz was my good-by to Old Mexico, for I was to sail that evening on the "Monterey" of the Ward Line for Nassau, New Providence, the Bahamas. With storm warnings displayed on the ancient lighthouse, the voyage from Vera Cruz to Nassau in a small steamer could not be one of happy anticipation. The "Monterey" coming in from New York docked at noon in Vera Cruz. For three hours the ship was closed to passengers while, according to health regulations, it was subjected to a thorough fumigation.

"Viva Los Estados Unidos" the Chorus of the Children

Just before taking the steamer came one of the choicest experiences of my Mexico adventure. Through a sympathetic interpreter, I talked to three hundred adorable little Mexicans in the Vera Cruz Orphanage. Attentive, enthusiastic, responsive, it was a delight to speak to these boys and girls. When I expressed my pleasure at visiting Mexico and exclaimed: "Viva Mexico!" they were quick to chorus, "Viva Los Estados Unidos!" At the close of my talk when I told them that I was sailing that night on the "Monterey" they immediately called out, "Un bien viaje, Senorita!" They admirably sang the Mexican national anthem and a group of girls gracefully presented a patriotic drill. I was loathe to leave the little folks and go out into the darkness of a night at sea. Did the children divine it, I wonder? As I left the building where these little people are comfortably housed and well cared for, they gathered in the large patio to cheer me on my way. It really was a musical bedlam of good-by and bon voyage! Over and over again they called out their good wishes, and followed me to the door where friends were waiting to take me to the steamer.

From Vera Cruz to the Bahamas

That night as I rocked in the cradle of the deep, child faces seemed to people my little cabin, child hands waved to me, child voices called out "Un bien viaje, Senorita." Earnestly I prayed for the children of Mexico, the children of America, and the children of all the world. God grant we may help make for them through life, a good, a safe journey!

HOW CAN WOMEN PROMOTE SENTIMENT FOR LAW OBSERVANCE

LEADING WOMEN OF AMERICA, IN ANSWER TO REQUEST FROM THE UNION SIGNAL, EX PRESS THEIR CONVICTIONS IN REGARD TO OBSERVANCE OF AND RESPECT FOR LAW, AND THE PART WOMEN SHOULD TAKE IN PROMOTING SENTIMENT THEREFOR

Preserve the Law by Obeying the Law

Gene Stratton-Porter

The vital point at the present minute is that the parents shall themselves preserve the law. So long as the children grow up in the homes of today, seeing their fathers and mothers breaking the laws of God and the laws of man, it is quite useless to undertake to instil in their young hearts a love of law and order.

When I was a youngster, children were taught the Ten Commandments, which were supposed to embody the chief elements of the law of God; and they were not taught a parrot-like repetition but that these were laws which they must (and did) obey. If you go into the public schools of today, and ask all the pupils of ten years of age to repeat the Ten Commandments, which represent the law of God, you will do well if you find even one who can do so. As for the laws of man, children see their parents break them in regard to temperance, to motoring, to tax paying, and in endless small forms of gambling. Unthoughtedly, children are given money to work gambling machines, which teaches them that there are methods in the world by which money may be had for nothing. And so it goes on through a list long enough to make a big book, if every form of petty law breaking coming today under the immediate observation of children were entered into.

"The Spirit and the Letter"

Women can promote sentiment for the observance of law by themselves obeying the law. If they kept the spirit and letter of the law of God, to which almost all of them subscribe in the abstract, that would be a wonderful start on the road to reformation; and if they did the same thing concerning the laws of their nation, their state, their county and their city, that would be almost equally wonderful.

The only possible way in which mothers, fathers, ministers, teachers—anyone in authority you will—can instil in the minds of the young reverence for law, is for the elders themselves to obey the laws rigidly.

Paramount Duty of Christian Women

Helen B. Montgomery, President
The Northern Baptist Convention

I believe that there is no duty which lies more pressingly upon the Christian women of the country than that of upholding the Prohibition Amendment.

The disregard of this, one of the fundamental laws of the nation, is undermining the general reverence for law. We must make our own sentiments known everywhere and we must stand up for the law and its observance in every way in which patriots can stand. I think we may promote sentiment by seeing that frequent items are printed in our local papers. Perhaps the majority of the temperance women of the nation live in small country communities. The newspapers of these communities have in the aggregate a very wholesome influence. If we "drys" can get inserted in the columns of these papers brief articles in regard to the scientific teachings of temperance, the deleterious effects of wine and beer upon the health of the community, short items of encouragement regarding the enforcement of the law, and other material, such as can be readily obtained through THE UNION SIGNAL, we shall do a tremendous service.

Work For Dry Candidates

I have another suggestion; that is, that temperance women should strive to get into the pages of their denominational weeklies strong temperance articles. I have found these weeklies quite willing to print what we send them; but the greatest way of all in which we can effect the enforcement of the prohibition law is to bring our influence strongly to bear on the selection of members of the House and Senate. We must watch the primaries. We must attend the primaries. We must question the candidates and make them fully declare themselves, and then we must work for the election of dry candidates as we never worked before in our lives, at the coming election.

No Time to Sleep

The trouble with our Christian forces is that they tend to lie down and go to sleep between engagements, and this is no time to be found dozing at our post. Probably, consequences more momentous than any we have formerly known hang upon the choice of our next Congress. We ought to hold prayer meetings in all the churches and see that sermons are preached, that editorials are written, that petitions are circulated, and that the record of each candidate is scrutinized, and that the women of the community are rallied solidly behind the selection and election of dry candidates.

Respect For Law Best Learne in the Home

Marietta Holley

In giving an opinion as to how wome can help best in the observance of la and order, which is so lacking at th time, I desire to say that while I ful appreciate how much may be done t the banded strength of womanhood i teaching ethics and influencing publ opinion for righteousness—still I thin the greatest and surest way to accomplis this is through the education of the chil in the home.

If parents in a pleasant home woul make just and reasonable laws gover ing their household, and insist on the observance, children would grow up wit a well founded respect for law and feeling that it is "up to them" to nc violate it.

But at present it seems that too man parents have in some way lost all co trol over their children. And when child grows up in a careless, unattra tive home, with no law, only the child' love of "having a good time," what ca one expect when the child has grow older?

Work On, Pray On

Being naturally an optimist, I am sur the world in some ways is growing be ter as well as wiser but, though ther are many pleasant and harmoniou homes where the children are happy an dutiful, still in too many household the reverse is true. And it is a depress ing sight to see young girls who need and should have, a mother's close care walking the streets at any hour, wearin dresses their grandmothers might wel call indecent, exchanging slangy, so-calle conversation with self-important youn boys reeking with hair oil and cheap pro fanity. By looking upon such a scen the thoughtful observer cannot hel wondering what sort of a father an mother those young people had—and wha kind of a home they left.

Much, I suppose, of the evil times upo which the country seems to have fallen the almost complete contempt and de finance of law shown especially in regard to the liquor traffic, must be laid to the terrible upheaval and aftermath of the world war.

And those who deplore the present state of things can only work on to the best of their ability, praying to the Great Helper that when the country has recovered from the shock and horror and financial losses of war, a better and saner time may prevail, and the hope of the great leader, whose birthday we have just celebrated, that true government. temperance, law and order "may not perish from the earth" be realized.

We believe that when coal in the mine and not in the grate will warm you; when flour in the barrel and not in the loaf will feed you; when wool on the sheep's back and not woven into cloth will clothe you, then public sentiment that is lying around loose and not gathered up through the electric battery of the ballot-box, or sent tingling along the wires of law, will change the ways of men.

—Frances E. Willard.

MAYORS NOTE MANIFOLD BENEFITS FROM PROHIBITION

NINETEEN OUT OF TWENTY-ONE EXECUTIVES QUESTIONED, TESTIFY TO VALUE OF DRY LAW

Of twenty-one answers received from mayors of our large cities, to a letter asking as to the effect of prohibition on their respective communities, nineteen contained strong commendation of the dry law, and only two were unfavorable. These statements will be published from week to week. Ask your local papers to reprint them, thus giving them wider publicity.

Crime and Delinquency More Than Cut in Two

March 17, 1922.

With pleasure I give my views on prohibition as operated in this city and state.

A bone-dry prohibition law became effective in Utah some years before the enactment of the Volstead Act. After the measure had been in effect a year, prohibition was made a part of our state constitution by an almost unanimous vote.

I doubt if five per cent of the people of the state would want to go back now to the old days of the liquor traffic and open saloons.

While, unfortunately, we have some bootlegging here, as elsewhere (and perhaps will continue to have it for a while inasmuch as the liquor traffic is an institution of thousands of years' standing and cannot be stopped in a year's time), still it works wonders in every avenue of our community life.

From statistics compiled in our police department, drunkenness has been reduced perhaps 80 per cent. Crime and juvenile delinquency have been more than cut in two as a result of prohibition. I believe, also, that there are fewer divorces now than before, although, unfortunately, we have too many divorces in our community, as they have elsewhere.

Prohibition has helped in the matter of employment. The charity organizations of our community, except during the abnormal times now prevailing, have been called upon to render less service to the needy since prohibition than before. Big industries of our section report that better service on the part of their employes is rendered now than in the liquor days, both in the quality of the work produced and the quantity thereof. Men who heretofore were indifferent to their work are now more thrifty and saving. The health of the community is much improved, and the quantity of happiness has been wonderfully increased.

C. CLARENCE NESLEN,
Mayor of Salt Lake City, Utah.

No Fair-Minded Person Can Question Good Accomplished

March 22, 1922.

Prohibition of the liquor traffic has been of benefit to the city of Wilmington, Delaware.

It has reduced drunkenness and the offenses that accompany that evil. It has reduced crime. The records of our police courts show a marked decrease in violations of the law; the records of the workhouse also indicate a decided falling off in population.

It has had a favorable effect on juvenile delinquency and on domestic relations.

With regard to the unemployment situation and the cases handled by charity organizations and those agencies that look after the poor, it is difficult to make an accurate statement because of the industrial depression. I think on the whole, however, the situation would have been much harder to handle if we had not had prohibition.

Several of the large employers assure me that there is marked improvement in efficiency and in regularity of work since the passage of the prohibition amendment.

Prohibition has promoted thrift as indicated by increased savings in the banks.

The effect of prohibition on the health, happiness and prosperity of the community has, on the whole, been distinctly beneficial. Of course bootlegging is rampant, and furnishes a large percentage of the cases now brought to court. Nevertheless, I do not think any fair minded person can question the good already accomplished in the short time since we have banned liquor.

LE ROY HARVEY,
Mayor of Wilmington, Delaware.

Health, Happiness and Prosperity Greatly Enhanced

March 9, 1922.

The mayor desires me to say for him that the general effects of prohibition in the city of Los Angeles and throughout Southern California are good. There have been some problems and difficulties in connection with the enforcement of the law, due, probably, to several facts, as follows:

First: California is known as one of the largest wine making states in the Union.

Second: It has a thousand miles of seacoast and is in close proximity to Mexico and Canada, where liquor is easily obtainable. It is almost impossible, therefore, to entirely suppress the smuggling of liquor and drugs.

Third: California has a large percentage of pleasure seeking people,—men and women who have wealth and leisure, and, therefore, the inclination to buy and consume liquor. These things have added to the usual difficulty experienced in enforcing temperance laws. The conditions, however, have decidedly improved in the last two or three months. The encouraging thing about the situation is that hundreds of men and women who have been indifferent as to law enforcement are now taking a firm stand and demanding that the vigorous and vociferous minority shall observe the law, or suffer the consequences.

The city of Los Angeles has benefited materially because of the prohibition of the liquor traffic.

There has been a large decrease in the number of arrests for drunkenness since the closing of the saloons. Owing to the prevalence of bootlegging and the large increase of population the statistics do not show a reduction in crime.

Juvenile delinquency and domestic relations have both improved under prohibition.

The unemployment situation in Los Angeles is quite satisfactory. Charity organizations report less destitution, better homes, more children in school, better living conditions, clothing and health, due to the closing of the saloon.

There has been a marked improvement in efficiency and ability to work, on the part of employes.

Savings banks and like institutions have an increased number of new accounts, largely among the working class.

The mayor believes that the health, happiness and prosperity of Southern California have been greatly enhanced by the abolition of the liquor traffic.

Further, the mayor desires me to assure you of his best wishes for the success of the wonderful work done by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

H. H. Kinney,
Secretary to GEORGE E. CRYER, Mayor of Los Angeles, California.

Prohibition an Undoubted Benefit Declares Oklahoma Official

March 17, 1922.

Prohibition has unquestionably been of benefit to our city. It has reduced drunkenness, and crime traceable directly to drunkenness and drinking.

It has had a favorable effect on juvenile delinquency, as well as on domestic relations and without liquor we have many more happy homes than we had before it was abolished.

I do not believe we would have as many unemployed now as we had before prohibition, only at this time we are passing through the greatest period of unemployment that has ever come under my observation. However, this is not traceable, in any manner, to the liquor question.

I think the law has been of great advantage to various industries, in promoting greater efficiency and more steady work on the part of employes.

Prohibition has without doubt had a great deal to do with promoting the thrift movement as indicated by increased savings in our banks.

I think prohibition has greatly increased the health, happiness and prosperity of our community. Of course, we have the bootlegger and poison liquor to contend with and cope with, but I believe the public will soon be educated to a point where our better citizenship and our courts will co-operate with the law enforcing arms, at which time the law conditions will be greatly improved.

J. C. WALTON,
Mayor of Oklahoma City, Oklahoma.

The League of the Golden Pen

Do you belong to the League of the Golden Pen? If you are a member of the W. C. T. U., of course you do. The requirements for membership are simple—a promise to use the pen in the writing of letters to make someone happier, to further some good cause or work. There is an occasion just now for using the "pen of gold" in writing letters of appreciation to the editors of some of our popular periodicals which are giving space to articles or editorials in favor of national prohibition. We have in mind the Saturday Evening Post, Collier's Weekly, The American Magazine, Ladies' Home Journal, Current Opinion, which in their late issues have presented fairly the present situation. Why not send them a word of appreciation and commendation, and express the hope that they may continue to give their readers the truth, on this vital question.

We're Moving!!

For the last few weeks the workers at National W. C. T. U. Headquarters have been living in an environment of steamfitters, calciminers, painters, electricians and other distractions not calculated to promote the serenity of mind favorable to the highest efficiency. The new National W. C. T. U. Headquarters building is now sufficiently near completion to permit the national general officers, the editorial and the circulation department workers to move into their new offices, and they are quickly adjusting themselves to the new order of things. If this week you find any misspelled words, punctuation marks gone astray, or lines topsy-turvy, please, gentle reader, pardon us, for we are in the throes of "getting settled".

WHY A MILLION MEMBERS?

There are a score of answers to the question, "Why is the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union in a campaign for a Million Members?" But the one big outstanding reason that at present overshadows all others is this: To mobilize a Million Women to work with us for the observance, enforcement and retention of the Volstead Code and the Eighteenth Amendment.

The A. A. P. A.

The Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, organized in all the large cities, announces a definite campaign for the following definite purposes:

First: To get the Volstead Act out of the law and keep it out.

Second: To oppose the passage of similar tyrannical laws, and to endeavor to have the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment (so long as it remains in force) left to the people of the several states under the concurrent clause.

Third: To work patiently, lawfully, fairly and patriotically for the repeal of the Prohibition Amendment, and in the hope that the Constitution of the United States will hereafter be preserved from mutilation by an organized fanatical minority.

1. To this end the association is calling for members—a million of them, at one dollar a year, each member promising to work for the repeal of the Volstead Act.

2. Each member is asked to favor, and vote for, under normal conditions, those legislative and Congressional candidates who openly stand for the repeal of the Volstead Law and who favor states rights as to prohibition.

3. The Association has taken as its slogan, "Help us to Repeal the Volstead Law."

4. The Association Against the Prohibition Amendment says: "Newspaper advertising is now a permanent feature of our work and we expect ultimately to reach every part of the country with our advertising matter." "Through the press we will bring to the attention of the people the hideous failure and enormous cost in lives and money of prohibition as now enforced."

5. The Association Against the Prohibition Amendment sends out this appeal:

"Join the Association. Get your friends and associates to do likewise. Wear the Association's emblem where it can be seen. Tell everybody just what it stands for. Send to us for literature and distribute it among those who are in sympathy. Send in the names of friends to whom we may write, mentioning your name and enclosing our literature. Write letters for publication, addressed to the editor of your daily paper, urging present obedience to the Volstead Law, and at the same time demanding its repeal. Write him again when he prints an article containing misleading prohibition propaganda.

"We have no hesitancy in saying that with reasonable co-operation on the part of present members, it will be comparatively easy to enroll our first million members. After the first million members, other millions should be still easier to secure. We feel that Congressmen, editors and politicians will be the first to recognize an awakening of public opinion and to change their attitudes correspondingly."

The W. C. T. U.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union, with a membership of nearly half a million God-fearing, home-loving women, is in a definite campaign, with the following definite purposes:

First: To elect a Congress that will permit no weakening of the Volstead Act

Second: To elect state legislators who will vote for the retention or the enactment of enforcement laws in harmony with the Volstead Code.

Third: To work patiently, lawfully, fairly, patriotically and prayerfully for the observance and enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment, in the confidence that it will forever remain a part of the Constitution.

1. To this end the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is in a campaign to win a Million Members, each to sign the total abstinence pledge and promise to employ all proper means to secure the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

2. The W. C. T. U. is asking the women of the nation to favor at election time those Congressional candidates who will promise to vote and work for the retention of the Volstead Law and the Eighteenth Amendment, and for their enforcement.

3. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union has taken as its slogan for this campaign, "Help us to Hold the Volstead Law."

4. Through every possible legitimate channel of publicity the W. C. T. U. will give to the public information as to the vast benefits of prohibition, testified to by governors, mayors, health directors, business men, and other well-known authorities, and will bring to the attention of the people a realization of the disasters that would follow the return of the traffic in wine and beer.

5. The National W. C. T. U. issues this call:

"Join the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Get your friends and associates to do likewise. Wear the emblem of the W. C. T. U.—the bow of white ribbon—where it can be seen. Tell everybody what it stands for. Send to us for literature. Write letters for publication addressed to the editor of your daily paper, urging present obedience to the Volstead Law, and at the same time pleading for its retention. Write him again when he prints articles containing false or misleading statements. Thank him when he takes the right point of view on prohibition. We have no hesitancy in saying that with reasonable co-operation on the part of present members, it will be comparatively easy to enroll our first MILLION MEMBERS. After the first million members are gained other millions should be still easier to secure. We feel that Congressmen, editors and politicians will be the first to recognize the strength of public opinion for national prohibition and to align themselves accordingly."

During this election year the Woman's Christian Temperance Union membership drive and all our department activities must aid specifically the mighty campaign for the retention of the Volstead Code!

NATIONAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION, ATLANTIC CITY, NEW JERSEY, NOVEMBER 18-23, 1922

WOMEN VOTERS' DECALOGUE

1. Be intelligent on all points relating to your citizenship duties and privileges, burning the midnight electricity, if need be, to inform yourself on the vitally important issues before the voters.

2. Be not content to let anyone, not even your "beloved husband," do your civic thinking for you, but in your own mind and heart ponder the questions to be decided at the next-election, and settle them according to your best judgment and the dictates of your conscience.

3. Be not satisfied with mere theoretical knowledge gained from books, magazines and newspapers but seek diligently to learn how to play the "game of politics," so that you may squarely and fairly checkmate the men who endeavor to control politics for their own selfish ends.

4. Take no rest until you have aroused all your women friends to a lively interest in candidates and primaries, ballots and elections, erstwhile masculine affairs, and have caused them to realize that these may be as fascinating as are bridge or tennis or golf.

5. Engrave upon the tablets of your memory and the memories of your women friends, neighbors and acquaintances the dates when you must register, or when the primaries will be held.

6. Make it your special business to look carefully into the records of the candidates who solicit your vote, to become acquainted with their past and their present records, and their probable future intentions and actions in matters political.

7. Having gained this knowledge concerning candidates, proclaim it from the housetop, that is to say, in the women's club, the ladies' aid, the W. C. T. U. and the missionary society.

8. Go not alone to the primaries, but extend a cordial invitation to your women friends to accompany you; call for them in your automobile, if you possess one, but see that they neglect not this important act—voting at the primaries.

9. Aim to be in your community an information bureau on all questions relating to citizenship, especially candidates, primaries and elections. Between now and election day spend much time in "golden gossip" with your friends and family on these topics, that all in your circle may be prepared to vote intelligently and conscientiously on the pending issues, and for or against the men and women candidates who may have it in their power to decide these questions in Congress or the legislature.

10. Forget not at the family altar, in private devotions, and at the church midweek service to ask for wisdom and guidance to exercise aright your franchise, to the end that you and others like-minded may by your ballots bring nearer the day when "all men's weal shall be each man's care."

How Candidates Are Nominated

who have united on a certain candidate for a special office. In some states the naming of candidates for party nomination is by petition only. The number of signatures required upon the petition depends upon the office to which the candidate is to be elected and upon the population of the community. After the petition has been circulated and the required number of names secured, there is held a primary election, at which the name is presented and the nomination confirmed. This method holds in nominating all candidates from the humblest office to that of presidential electors.

It is at the primary that delegates are elected to the county or city conventions and at these conventions delegates are elected to the state convention. The state convention is most important, for it is at the state convention that delegates are chosen for the national convention, where the nominations for President and Vice-President are made. National conventions of the several parties are held every four years, and at the national conventions the policies of the party are defined in what is called the party platform.

We see, therefore, the great importance of the primary, and the urgent need for each voter taking an intelligent part in its proceedings.

In the past there have been, and doubtless there still are, many irregularities, if not absolute dishonesty, at the primary elections, but now in most of the states the primaries have been placed under the control of the law and it is generally conceded that the primary elections are honestly conducted, at least as much so as any other election.

We must stress the importance of the woman voter taking an active part in the primary. If we desire to see reforms accomplished and worthy candidates nominated who will insure good government, we must begin the work in the primary.

No greater political responsibility devolves upon the woman citizen than that involved in the primary election. It is there that the aspirations of immoral or undesirable candidates may be defeated and their names weeded from the list. It is there that the woman citizen may most easily and emphatically notify her party that in order to secure her support at the general election, the party ticket must represent in its entirety the highest standards of morality and efficiency. By so doing she may aid magnificently in ushering in that era of good government which the staunchest patriot will admit is still to be desired.

Congratulations to Japan!

As noted on last week's cover page, a cablegram from Japan was received by Miss Anna Adams Gordon, to the effect that a bill prohibiting the sale or giving away of liquor to minors has passed the parliament, and becomes effective April first. This bill, we are informed, has passed the lower house of the National Diet of Japan ten times and has several times been approved by a committee of the House of Peers, but has always heretofore been finally voted down in the upper house. The final passage of the measure is a triumph for the temperance forces in the Sunrise kingdom. It is an interesting thing to note that the new law goes into effect the first day of the birthday month of Madam Yajima, who will be ninety years old on April 24.

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awakening continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

The Aaronic Benediction

Used by the W. C. T. U. at Meetings

The Lord bless thee, and keep thee. The Lord make His face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee. The Lord lift up His countenance upon thee, and give thee peace. Num. 6:24, 25, 26.

You hear a call to service. An appeal is made for workers among the children of disadvantage and want. You say you have no time to spare. Perhaps if you had much time to spare the Master could not use it. I mean that if you had superfluities you might treat them as superfluities, and they would be impotent for service. "I can easily spare half an hour. I shall be delighted to offer that." No, it's the half hour we can't easily spare for which our Master is hungry. You say you have been "teaching all the week," and it would be "hard lines" to teach on Sunday. And just because it would be "hard lines," and just because it would cost you something, and just because the offering would be blood-money, it would tell tremendously in the treasury of the Lord.

—Rev. J. H. Jowett.

Virginia News and Narrative

Faith T. Parrott

The very day the state legislature closed, the prohibition amendments, after heartfelt support and unceasing watching lest the enemy insert harmful clauses, were taken out of the conference and signed by Governor Trinkle. These amendments, championed by Senator Mapp and Delegate Park Deans, influential men in their sections, are causing much rejoicing among temperance people. Through them it will become easier to enforce the law. The search and seizure measures are greatly simplified, allowing officers without a warrant to enter freight and passenger stations, storage rooms, boats and automobiles where there seems reason to suspect violations. But this does not apply to private dwellings and Pullman cars.

The manufacture of stills, or the possession of one, becomes an offense; suspension of jail sentence is forbidden, except under unusual conditions. Change of venue is allowed. Many other helpful measures of enforcement were passed, including the one that places in the hands of the state's attorney general an appropriation of $75,000.00.

The governor, lieutenant governor, and others caused this to be known as the sympathetic administration, from which the people will expect much.

One of the papers calls attention to the fact that the day is gone when temperance forces can get all they want, but the new amendments are the best prohibition laws ever enacted in the state of Virginia. Three cheers for the patient, untiring workers who won the victory!

Much interest was felt in the W. C. T. U. institute in Charlottesville and genuine welcome awaited Mrs. Frances P. Parks, national corresponding secretary, Mrs. Elizabeth A. Perkins, national director of the Child Welfare department, and Mrs. Sara H. Hoge, state president and national assistant recording secretary, who presided. The meeting of the state executive committee was held the day following. Charlottesville is the seat of Virginia's noted university.

Mottoes—
"Would you guard your health in truth, Guard your stomach well in youth."
Posters—

Spot Map—Of the organization of the Health department in your territory.

In harmony with the plan for the year, the annual health meeting will be held in the month of May, and the topic is nutrition. The goal is a health meeting in each local union in the United States Begin now to plan for it. Plan for big things, and work for big things, and big things will occur.

The program given is suggestive The meeting may well be opened with one of the health songs. Practice these songs beforehand. The leaflet, "The Adequate Diet," could be read by some one person, or assigned to several. It would be very interesting if samples of the food prepared for one of "The Meatless Dinners" were on exhibition for demonstrating some of the principles in the leaflet. "Fruit—Its Value" has proved to be excellent material for presentation and discussion at these health meetings. And though "The House that Johnnie Lives In" is prepared for the L. T. L., yet it is also of real value for adults. Be sure to have some good reader present it. All this literature should be ordered from the National W. C. T. U. in ample time for the May meeting.

Interest will be added to the occasion by having someone letter the suggested health motto, or some other appropriate one, and by having it hung in a conspicuous place. The poster should also occupy a prominent place at the meeting. Charts and diagrams can also be made and used effectively for health. A spot map, too, showing the extent of the Health department organization in your territory, will be illuminating. Literature put in convenient packages can often be sold. Or can be given away in some cases.

And finally, the meeting can be made the occasion of a call for new members, in the same way as any other meeting of the organization; and thus the department co-operates in the Million Member drive. Let all our state Health superintendents work together, and run up a large number of annual health meetings for 1922.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

Uncle Sam, Traffic Cop

By Jonathan Hayseeds, C. E., W. G. in Christian Endeavor World

Legging it down Broadway, Jerushy suddenly gripped my arm like a cider-press. Honest to goodness, the crowds an' jam of automobiles was scareful. Jerushy ain't used to that kind of jam. It looked like Broadway was dammed up with tin Lizzies an' trucks, as tight as the ice gorge in our crick. Two weak human bein's get across that? Yes, mebbe, by airplane.

* * * * *

All to wunst, with a quick squeeze that black-an'-blued my left bicep, Jerushy squeaked into my tinpanum, "Look, J. H." (that's her shorthand for "Jonathan Hayseeds"); "who'd ever believe a white glove could bust up that gorge like dynamite?"

* * * * *

The white-mustached cop cackled a dry laugh, like hickory-nuts rollin' across the garret floor. "They wa'n't always that prompt, ma'm," he said. "I mind whin this Broadway traffic squad was first sprung on New Yorruk. The drivers thought it was the biggest joke ever. They kidded us like we was a piece of cheese, an' thought it awfully funny an' cute to pretend not to see the white glove. An' pedestrians on the sidewalk—some of the best people in New Yorruk, ma'm—gave us cops the ha-ha. No one had much respect for the white-gloved dude, an' the best papers said it could never be done here; this wa'n't no Podunk: New Yorruk couldn't be bossed that schoolma'm way."

"Kind of proud of bein' unruly an' too big to be spanked, eh?" I chippered to the old cop.

"Ixactly, sor. Niver did it occur to him drivers nor their imployers that we was worrukin' for their good, that their business could be done cheaper an' better with good order presarved at the crossin's. An' they threatened prosecutions an' political pulls."

* * * * *

"Which is a memo for the diary of Uncle Sam, Traffic Cop," says I aloud to my private self.

"Meanin' which, sor?" ast the cop between whiles of helpin' a blind lead-pencil pedler across, an' jerkin' up an autochief who was trying to sneak past.

"Meanin' the Eighteenth Amendment," brazens I, expectin' to get what the boys call the "raspberry." Jerushy tugged at my sleeve, panicky like, trying to hurry me out of the war zone, though she's worn the white ribbon nigh onto forty year.

But I'm cheerman of the enforcement committee down to the Corners, an' I spunked up an' looked the old chap in the eye like Daniel starin' the lions out of countenance. He looked like his name might have been Dennis O'Flannigan, from Tipperary. "Yep," sez I; "this an' Uncle Sam's traffic job is like two peas in a pod. They're both for better business an' a safer country; but at the start them as will be benefited most don't understand, an' they're kickin' agin the pricks wusser'n contankerous oxen. They've got to be educated jest as your traffic squad educated New York. Why, today a lot of 'em would like to make a laugh of Uncle Sam's white glove, an' even spit on it. They don't want the John Barleycorn traffic on the cross street stopped to let the main thoroughfares have an inning. Why, the brewer's big wagons have been hoggin' the street-crossin's for a hundred or two years, an' legitimate business ain't never had a fair show yet."

"Its roight yez are, me b'y," says the old cop, with a fine Tipperary twinkle in his eye, as soon as I stopped, out of breath. "Don't Oi know? Wouldn't most of my throubles be inded if this Volstead act was inforced? An' them as don't loike Uncle Sam's traffic squad, let 'em go to Beelzebub, or Chicawgo. It was a dry army that cleaned up the Argonne, and dented Hindenburg's line. An' a dry people at home that supported 'em; I know; my b'ys was there. An' it's me as is fernenst the traffic hog all the time. As betwixt the traffic hog, sor, an' the traffic cop it's goin' to be the same with Uncle Sam as it was with Broadway; it's hot air against a granite wall. Uncle Sam is just a bigger Broadway squad, and the white glove will win again as it did before, either that, or there won't be any traffic worth regulatin'; for, where there ain't respect for the majesty of the law, there won't be nothin' doin' worth makin' into history."

Noted Writer Gives Unanswerable Argument in Favor of Total Abstinence

Edward W. Bok, for over a score of years editor of The Ladies Home Journal, in his autobiography, tells why he made total abstinence the rule of his life, as follows:

Then, as I looked around and came to know more of people and things, I found the always unanswerable argument in favor of a young man's abstinence; that is, that the most successful men in America today are those who never lift a wine-glass to their lips. Becoming interested in this fact I had the curiosity to personally inquire into it, and of twenty-eight of the leading business men in the country whose names I selected at random, twenty-two never touch a drop of wine of any sort. I made up my mind that there was some reason for this. If liquor brought safe pleasures, why did these men abstain from it? If as some say, it is a stimulant to a busy man, why did not these men, directing the largest business interests in this country, resort to it? And when I saw that these were the men whose opinions in great business matters were accepted by the leading concerns of the world, I concluded that their judgment in the use of liquor would satisfy me. If their judgment in business matters could command the respect and attention of the leaders of trade on both sides of the sea, their decision as to the use of liquor was not apt to be wrong.

And as opportunities came to me to go around in homes and at public places, I find that I do not occupy a solitary position. The tendency to abstain from liquors is growing more and more among young men of today. The brightest young men I know, young men who are filling positions of power and promise, never touch a drop of beer, wine, or intoxicants of any sort. And the young man who today makes up his mind that he will be on the safe side and adhere to strict abstinence will find that he is not alone. He has now the very best element in business and social life in the largest cities of our land with him.

It will win him surer favor than aught else in eyes which he will some time think are the sweetest he has ever looked into.

Y. P. B. News Notes

Special Correspondence

Mrs. Maude B. Perkins, national general secretary of the Young People's Branch, is one of the most versatile, adaptable and acceptable speakers that Colorado has ever had. The week opened with the Sixth district convention where she made a fine impression. On that occasion the members of the Le-Roy Y. P. B., a large country branch, had the rare privilege of hearing the message of their national leader and coming in touch with her. The other places visited were Fort Morgan, Denver, Boulder, Fort Collins and Greeley. At each a delightful afternoon function, as well as addresses in schools and to gatherings of young people, gave impetus to the work. Educators were very appreciative in their attitude. One invited Mrs. Perkins to speak on social morality to a special group of girls; another set aside a long period for an address in a business college, followed by questions on the cigaret by the instructor, who warned his pupils that "the cigaret reduces efficiency twenty-five percent and that young people cannot afford to enter the business world with such a handicap." Mrs. Maude B. Perkins is most cordially invited to come again and often to Colorado.

It is fortunate for the Y. P. B. work in North Dakota that Mrs. Necia E. Buck, state organizer, is also Y. P. B. secretary for the state. Mrs. Buck understands and loves young people and is always on the lookout for opportunities to gather them into the Y. P. B. Since the state convention, Mrs. Buck has succeeded in organizing three lively branches as follows: Preston Y. P. B. with ten boys and three girls, Mrs. Rose Kyle, superintendent; Calvin, with nineteen girls and eleven boys, Mrs. John Porter, superintendent; and Pingree, with twenty-four members and Prof. F. W. Jungck as general secretary. All of these young people are eager and interested and are sure to make their influence felt in the future history of North Dakota.

Enforcement Institute and Jubilee Banquet Features of North Dakota's Mid-Year Meeting

Barbara H. Wylie, State Corresponding Secretary

Of special interest was the enforcement institute in connection with the mid-year meeting of the North Dakota W. C. T. U. executive committee, held in the First Baptist Church, Fargo. The state president, Mrs. Elizabeth Preston Anderson, presided, and Rev. R. W. Hobbs, D. D., pastor of the church, offered prayer. A splendid array of legal talent had consented to help and, under the general topic, "Duties and Obligations of Officers and Citizens in the Enforcement of Law," Attorney A. G. Divet outlined the duties of the Federal prohibition director and the attorney general of the state, stressing also the direct responsibility of the citizen to see that the law is obeyed. Judge M. J. Englert's subject was "The U. S. District Attorney and the States' Attorneys," and Judge Charles A. Pollock explained the duties of the U. S. marshal and the county sheriffs. These addresses were illuminating and the questions which followed showed the interest of the audience. Choice musical numbers were furnished by Miss Vera Redgrove, Mrs. Walter R. Reed, Mrs. George F. Dippell and Mr. Byron Hanson.

Next day, another session was held, the general topic being, "Methods of Procedure in Law Enforcement." Judge B. F. Spalding spoke on injunction and abatement, Rev. F. L. Watkins on the enforcement of the Anti-Cigaret, Anti-Snuff and Anti-Gambling laws, and Mr. Arthur A. Stone, Federal prohibition director, on prohibitive taxes. These helpful addresses were followed by a prolonged series of questions and much valuable information was given.

Jubilee Membership Banquet

Very enjoyable was the gathering of white-ribboners on this occasion. Mrs. Anderson, as toast mistress, was happy in her introductory remarks. As a member of the state trio team, she spoke of the duties of president in the intensive membership drive, calling upon the corresponding secretary, Mrs. Barbara H. Wylie, and the treasurer, Mrs. W. E. Black, to tell of the duties of corresponding secretaries and treasurers, respectively. Mrs. Fred M. Wanner, state vice-president, spoke on "Three Times Three," concluding her remarks with a solo, "Go on, go on," much to the delight of her hearers. Mrs. Frank Beasley, recording secretary, told us "How to Reach the Women of the Rural Districts"; Mrs. Necia E. Buck, state organizer, answered the question, "Why a Million Members?" and was followed by Mrs. Julia D. Nelson, president of the Fargo Scandinavian union and also a field worker, who spoke on the same subject. Miss Mary M. Carey's subject, "One Working Woman in Every Twenty-five," forcibly presented the work of Women in Industry. Mrs. Emma H. Clark emphasized THE UNION SIGNAL trio team plan and Miss Gordon's song, "Signal Steam for the Trio Team," was heartily sung by all present.

Miss Ina R. Johnson, assistant Y. P. B. secretary, told of the benefits to be derived from the Daily Vacation Bible School. As conductor of a large school last summer, Miss Johnson introduced L. T. L. methods, securing 144 signatures against cigaret and tobacco smoking. The state superintendents present spoke three minutes each on, "My Department as a Member-winner." Mrs. Kate S. Wilder, Child Welfare, Mrs. Abbie W. H. Best, The Bible in the Public Schools, Mrs. Lulu W. Zimmerman, Social Morality, Mrs. Mary M. Shaver, Publicity, and Mrs. Mable J. Moyer, Sabbath Observance. Two distinguished gentlemen were introduced, Rev. F. L. Watkins, state superintendent of the Enforcement League and always a staunch friend of the W. C. T. U., and Dr. A. O. Fonkalsrud, superintendent of St. Luke's Hospital, at which institution the crippled children, under the supervision of Mrs. Charles E. Jones, are being provided for so generously.

Two young lady reporters, Misses Finkle and Bacher, representing Fargo's two dailies, were introduced. To them the local and state unions are indebted for much valuable publicity.

Plans Adopted at the Executive Meeting

Reports for the past six months were encouraging. More unions had paid dues than at this time last year. Mrs. Buck reported the organization of sixteen local unions, sixteen L. T. L.'s, and three Y. P. B.'s. Plans were made for district conventions and it was decided to hold enforcement institutes in connection with these, as far as possible.

The membership drive was considered and because of conditions peculiar to North Dakota, it was decided to postpone the time for the intensive membership drive to May 10-31.

It was decided to send to Governor R. A. Nestos, a letter of grateful appreciation for the lofty sentiments expressed in his address at the State University on Founders' Day, in which he denounced the materialistic and un-Christian teaching too prevalent in many of our schools and higher institutions of learning.

The committee voted to endorse the action of the State Enforcement League and the North Dakota District of the Norwegian Lutheran Churches in condemning the attempt to repeal the Sunday theater law, through petitions now being circulated.

Florida's First State Conference Full of Enthusiasm and Inspiration

Julia H. Webb, State Superintendent, Sunday School Department

Gainesville was honored in entertaining the first state conference ever held in Florida, and she showed her appreciation of this honor by the splendid manner in which she received and entertained her guests. The evening before the conference the Gainesville union gave a most delightful reception at the White House Hotel in honor of the national representatives, Mrs. Frances P. Parks, national corresponding secretary, and Mrs. Elizabeth A. Perkins, national director of Child Welfare, and the state officers. A fine musical program was rendered, after which the guests were invited to partake of dainty refreshments. In the dining room a white and gold motif was carried out in the decorations.

Needed: Prayer, Purpose, Plans and Push

The conference opened the following morning at the Baptist church with Florida's state president, Miss Minnie B. Neal, in the chair. After the singing of "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name" a devotional service was conducted by Rev. Mable Quam Stevens, state superintendent of the Open Forum department, who read the story of "Deborah as Judge of Israel", making very impressive comments and stating that woman's work today is the same as Deborah's in her day. The two national guests were presented by the state president, Miss Neal, in her usual bright and attractive manner. She expressed her great love for the letter P, not only in names, but also in methods of work, speaking of the great need of prayer, purpose, plans and push in all of our undertakings. Mrs. Parks and Mrs. Perkins replied that they had been many times compared to peas in a pod and to almost all kinds of peas, even to green peas, but there was one thing very evident and that was that they were "dry" peas. State plans were presented, first, by Mrs. Nellie Doig, state treasurer, who spoke on "When are Dues Due?" Mrs. E. J. Baird, treasurer of the Gainesville union, spoke on the topic, "Holding Members," (a continued story) and illustrated the needs with four p's as follows: First, be prompt and punctual, second, be pleasant, third, be patient; and fourth, be prayerful.

All joined in singing "Ring, Jubilee Bells" after which another very important part of the program was taken up—the membership crusade.

Mrs. Susie Smith Bell, state corresponding secretary, being absent, her paper, "The Trio Team," was read by Mrs. Flower. The second topic, "Three Hours Work by Each Member," was presented by Mrs. Andrews of the High Springs union. She spoke of the use of the telephones, social calls, letters and invitations in our work and gave as her keywords, plan, push, and work. The third message, "All Christians Members," was very fully and capably handled by Mrs. Ida Flowers, state vice-president. She showed why the members of all missionary societies, all pupils in the Sunday schools, and all women in civic organizations, educational workers, social workers, child welfare workers, reform workers, and Americanization workers should be in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Mrs. Mattie P. Frost, president of the Jacksonville union, very ably presented the subject, "Winning by Literature," showing that literature helps to knowledge, which is power. Mrs. Stevens spoke on "Why Take THE UNION SIGNAL?" after which all united in singing "Signal Steam for the Trio Team," by Anna Adams Gordon. Mrs. Parks told a very interesting story of this song, which is only one of many given us by our wonderful national president and leader, Miss Gordon.

"In Quest of the Million" or "The Why and Wherefore of all this Crusade for Members" was extensively and interestingly handled by Mrs. Parks. "Women and Money", or the campaign for new members in Gainesville, was given by Mrs. Miller.

Methods of Winning Members

"Department Methods Practically Applied to Winning Members" was introduced by Dr. Grace Parker, who conclusively showed that Child Welfare is a very great work and should bring the greatest of results. Rev. Mable Stevens showed how the Open Forum department should successfully interest the public, in general, in becoming members of the W. C. T. U. Miss Julia Webb, state superintendent of the Sunday School department, placed the spiritual welfare of the child first, stating that the great victory of today was due largely to the faithful teachings in the Sunday school. The district presidents, Mrs. Baird of Alachua district and Mrs. Weihe of Marion district, advocated the changing about of posters in the districts, the reading of THE UNION SIGNAL and Child Welfare work. Miss Katherine Boyles, superintendent of Exhibits and Red Letter Days, told of the work of her department in the winning of new members. Mrs. Elizabeth Perkins summed up all of these most excellent topics by applying house making methods to the W. C. T. U. In raising a very large tent, each man pulled on one certain rope and that brought up the tent. A citizenship round table was very interestingly and helpfully held by Mrs. Mable Perkins Dean, recording secretary. Mrs. J. E. Sheffield, president of the Lake City union, gave an excellent address on "Enforcement of Laws" and a paper was read from A. L. Allen, prohibition director of Florida, on "Florida's Law Enforcement Program."

Reasons For Enlarging Membership

Dr. Anderson, pastor of the Presbyterian church of Gainesville, gave a forceful address on our present and future warfare. He stated that no act of law could make wrong right, adding that there is no law that protects and blesses more than does the 18th Amendment. He said that the world war memorialized our young men, but that the battle which resulted in the 18th Amendment memorialized the W. C. T. U.

Mrs. Perkins, speaking upon "The Mother's Problems" and "Mother's Meetings" showed that while this is new work to all other organizations it is not new to the W. C. T. U.

Mrs. Parks and Mrs. Perkins delivered splendid addresses. Mrs. Parks compared the W. C. T. U. to a million dollar manufacturing company established to create sentiment to outlaw the liquor traffic. She stated that there were thirty-one organizations manufacturing sentiment of a different nature and showed in a very forceful and conclusive manner why this is a critical time for state and nation. She closed by giving eighteen excellent reasons why we should continue in our million dollar manufacturing company and secure new stockholders. Mrs. Perkins showed how very necessary is the work of the Child Welfare department, for our nation's future depends wholly upon what we make of our children today.

That "Straw Vote" on Wine and Beer

(An Actual Occurrence)

The business woman was just about to enter the elevator when two or three men passed her talking loudly about "No one wants prohibition anyway. The referendum one of our papers has been taking proves that." The car was filled and she waited for the next. The elevator starter was standing near. He also had heard the conversation and a look of disgust overspread his face. Catching the eye of the business woman he exploded: "This rum question makes me plumb tired! What's the matter with those folks, anyway? Ain't prohibition in the Constitution, I'd like to know?"

"I suppose you have seen what the paper is doing, haven't you?" asked the woman. "You know every day it announces the results of referendums it claims to have taken in buildings, this among them, and that they show the majority have voted for wine and beer. It even prints the figures."

"Yes, I know it, but where do they get that noise? 'Wets win in this building!' Did they come to your office?"

"I don't think so and none of the folks I've asked saw them."

"I'm in charge of all these elevators, and I didn't see any one, either. S'pose they took it secretly among those they knew were wet, if they took it at all, and your office was too dry to suit 'em. What do they want liquor back for, I'd like to know? I wish they'd ask me whether prohibition was a success."

"What would you say?" asked the woman with interest.

"I could say plenty, all right. I'd tell them of the drunks who used to come in here and I had to throw 'em out. Weren't all down-and-outs, either. Why, the guys that operate in business, right here in the loop, were some of 'em so pickled they couldn't think straight half the time, let alone do any work. I'd have to coax 'em out, quiet-like, so folks couldn't spot 'em. Booze—what's it done for folks, I'd like to know?"

His hearer suggested that women, anyway, would stand firm for a dry country, but to her surprise this brought another outbreak:

"Huh, the women? Didn't that paper say some women's clubs are all for the booze? What for? I don't believe they are!"

"Neither do I, and there are the women in the homes, the mothers who, like your wife, get the children ready for school, cook the meals, and take care of the house. They won't let the prohibition law be changed, and there are many of them, you know."

"Sure they could do it, only they don't get together. That's why the crooks and rummies get by—the good people don't stand together. I'll tell you that if they don't though, the booze is sure going to get us again. Why, you know, if they'd just vote in the dry men and women, all the other questions would settle themselves, 'cause a dry man will be able to vote right on other things. I don't mean he wouldn't make mistakes now and then, but the country would be safe under him. But you just look out for these fellows that take a drink once in a while. You've got to keep them out, 'cause you can't trust 'em to vote right, or do the right thing. Say, how many women are there in that temperance thing you've told me about?"

"The W. C. T. U.? About five hundred thousand in this country, I believe, but they are trying to double the membership this next year or so."

"Well, I hope they go to it—and hustle, too! They oughtn't to stop for another thing. Let 'em tie up this booze and settle it good and hard once for all. Of course, you don't need to say I said so, 'cause I'm only the elevator starter. But I hear what everybody says.—This way—going up—"

And the business woman stepped into the elevator, wishing with all her soul that every member of the W. C. T. U. could have heard the earnest speech of this man, an inspiration to work for and win more members, and elect to office dry men and women, that the world may be made "safe for democracy" and for the children of the future.

The Enemy

Frances S. Hallowes

(The S. S. "Persia" is bound for India, having among its passengers Major Orde and Bertram Harford, who have become acquainted with a Mrs. Carlyle, her small son, Eric, and Angela O'Connor, who, in the charge of Mrs. Carlyle, is on her way to marry a Deputy Commissioner at Seraneb. Harford, who is a total abstainer, is glad to note that Angela refuses to drink, and the two become good friends. Consequently, Harford is much shocked to learn that Angela has been induced by Mrs. Carlyle to take some whisky for seasickness and has been overcome by the liquor. Through pity for her he breaks his reticence on the subject, and tells her that both his parents were victims of drink, and that he had promised his mother on her deathbed never to touch alcohol in any form. Angela admits that she has made her mother a similar promise, but does not mention any particular reason therefor. At Bombay Angela is met by her fiance, Frank Fortescue, and the wedding takes place. After a long railroad journey they arrive at Seraneb. During the course of the first dinner in the new home, Fortescue urges wine upon his wife, and under its influence she becomes first talkative and then drowsy, much to the distress of Divan Singh, a Christian native in charge of Fortescue's establishment, who pours out his fears to his wife.)

CHAPTER IX.

"Cheer up, my Divan, all the sahib-log drink the sharab. She will be the same as the rest."

"No, no! my beautiful Mem will be lost! lost! a drunkard! I see into the future. My Bible says no drunkard shall inherit the Kingdom." He shuddered.

"Hush! my husband. The Good God is merciful; let us ask Him to keep the beautiful Mem Sahiba from loving the drink."

The two humble native Christians knelt, and prayed for the fair girl wife, in the adjacent bungalow. Then Divan rose up, and Maryam said "My husband, do not give the Mem Sahiba wine or whisky."

"But, woe is me, I must obey my Sahib!"

"Well, then do not thou fill her glass unless the Sahib orders thee."

"True, oh wife! I will not; this hand shall not give my Mem the bottle of its own will. I will go now and see Shib Das, the khansama. Thou knowest his love of sharab. I may perhaps guard him from the serpent's venom, though over my Sahib's wife I am powerless."

He went along the line of houses and entered a dim interior, where, by the light of a flickering wick in a saucer of oil, a man and a woman and several children crouched together on the floor.

"Thy dinner was good, oh Shib Das! The Mem Sahib was glad at the good food!"

Shib Das grunted, his wife laughed. "Oh Master, see the clever khansama! His lord's whisky has made a beast of him!"

"Whisky! drunk again, oh Shib Das! What of your prophet, oh son of Mahomet? You break his law!"

The man grunted again; the woman laughed harshly.

"He is no worse than you Christian-dog. The Sahib and the Mem Sahiba are Christians, they drink the sharab. Dost thou, oh owl and son of an owl, set thyself up to teach? Thou art not wise."

"I am wise enough to tell thee that my husband is in danger of losing his situation. The Sahib said to me, 'Find out who has meddled with my whisky.' Thou hast done this thing, oh Shib Das! Woe, woe, Shib Das, to thy wicked drinking. Thou wilt lose thy soul, thou son of evil!"

"He is no more evil than the Sahibs," shouted his wife, turning on Divan Singh. "Thy Christians are the drunkards: it is they who teach the poor children of Mahomet to drink sharab and disobey their Prophet. You are a Christian—tell me why your Jesus men and women drink wicked water?"

Divan Singh sighed. "It is not my Jesus who teaches His children to drink. No, no! He says, 'No drunkards shall enter into heaven,' but it is Shaitan (Satan) who deceives and mocks the poor Christians, and makes them disobey Jesus."

"Well, we, thy servants, are as good as the Sahibs," returned Sunnia, the wife.

"Nay, say not so; every soul must speak to God for himself. I tell thee, Sunnia, that thou shalt promise to keep thy husband sober and he shall then stay in the service of the Sahib." He turned to the khansama with a heavy heart.

"Shib Das, I can cause thee to go, but tell the truth and thou shalt keep thy situation."

Shib Das grunted, but his wife flung herself down, and shrieked "Forgive, forgive, oh Master-jee! Thy servant will tell thee the truth. Shib Das took that whisky: I saw him do it."

"And tell me then, Sunnia, what put he into the bottle?"

"I know not! I know not! Speak, oh my husband!"

"Speak, and fear not, oh Shib Das! I will ask the Sahib to forgive thy fault. Thou dost not want to lose thy twenty rupees each month?"

"Nay, nay, tell him!" implored the wife.

"That spirit which thou burnest under thy silver kettle I took and poured into the Lord Sahib's whisky," said Shib Das, sullenly.

"Spirits of wine, sayest thou? No wonder the Sahib spat it violently on the floor! But now thou hast confessed, I will see the Sahib and ask His Highness to pardon thee. Shib Das, wilt thou give up this bad drink? It biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder! Look at thy children in rags and dirt, because thy rupees go to the drink shop."

"Master-jee, help me! help me! the sharab beckons to me, it goes down sweetly. Thy servant cannot say nay to it!"

"Poor slave, I will ask my God to help thee! Sunnia, come to me when thy husband wants drink, I will get thee medicine for him, and go not thou, Shib Das, to the bazaar for vegetables; Sibbo shall buy them. Thou will not then be tempted to spend the Sahib's money in drink. Thy wife shall take thy wages to buy thy food for herself and the children."

This arrangement suited the wife Sunnia, but her husband frowned and objected. There is no part of his work which a khansama likes so well, as the daily marketing in the bazaar, armed with his Sahib's money. He is then a person of importance, and can enter into the public questions of the hour. As nearly every operation of the Indian is performed in public, there is always an audience. Dressing, washing, shaving, eating, smoking, all are transacted out-of-doors. The mechanic does all his work crouching on the ground outside his hut, carpentering, tinning, stick turning. The tradesman also lives in the public gaze, squatting on the ground in the midst of his wares. The tailor with his sewing machine, the silversmith with his smelting coals, the bunia with his grains and the draper with his cloths, none rise from their crouching position to attend to customers, everything is within reach. Public questions are discussed, the talk of the bazaar is the sole excitement of an Indian community. Woe betide the delinquents who owe money, are unjust to their servants or cheat the merchants! All is known and commented on. Religion enters into every dealing; the fakir is generally somewhere about, and the Hindu temple and Mosque are always near the bazaar. Into this seething life, Shib Das went daily, and spent his master's money in drink, the coarse kind of rum sold cheaply to the natives. But now this avenue of amusement and indulgence was closed, and he was sobered by the shock.

A Warning to the American People

The Scriptural teaching, "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap," is emphasized by the following, which was unanimously adopted by the Judicial Section (composed only of Judges) of the American Bar Association at its Annual Convention at Cincinnati, Ohio, August 31, 1921.

"The Judicial Section of the American Bar Association, venturing to speak for all the Judges, wishes to express this warning to the American people:

"Reverence for law and enforcement of law depend mainly upon the ideals and customs of those who occupy the vantage-ground of life in business and society.

"The people of the United States, by solemn constitutional and statutory enactment, have undertaken to suppress the age-long evil of the liquor traffic.

"When, for the gratification of their appetites, or the promotion of their interests, lawyers, bankers, great merchants and manufacturers, and social leaders, both men and women, disobey and scoff at this law, or any other law, they are alding the cause of anarchy and promoting mob violence, robbery and homicide; they are sowing dragon's teeth, and they need not be surprised when they find that no judicial or police authority can save our country or humanity from reaping the harvest."

HOUSE BILL PROVIDES FOR DEPORTATION OF ALIEN VIOLATORS OF PROHIBITION AND NARCOTIC LAWS—UNUSUAL NUMBER OF SEATS IN SENATE TO BE FILLED IN NOVEMBER—AMERICA SPENDING MILLION DOLLARS DAILY FOR VETERANS—POSTERS CARRY EASTER MESSAGE—PROVISIONS OF BONUS BILL

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

Alien Violators of Prohibition and Narcotic Laws Will Be Deported Under House Bill

By a vote of 222 to 73, the House this week passed and sent to the Senate House bill H. R. 11118, authorizing, if the Secretary of Labor so orders by his warrant, after hearing, the deportation of aliens in the United States who may be convicted for violation of the Federal liquor and narcotic acts; and for violation and conviction after serving sentence of those convicted under state laws for violation of liquor and narcotic acts.

There are approximately 8,000,000 aliens in the United States. It is estimated that about 30,000 of them are violating either the narcotic law or the prohibition law.

In many places the majority of the liquor law violators are aliens.

The United States has provided for years for the deportation of alien criminals violating laws involving moral turpitude. Up to the present, the laws relating to the prohibition of narcotics and the liquor traffic have not been construed as involving moral turpitude.

We do not permit aliens who have violated the laws of their own countries to enter the United States, and if these aliens violate the laws of this country before being naturalized should they not be put in the same class? The only way to do this is by deportation.

The United States is the melting pot of the world. It can assimilate all law-abiding people who come to its shores. The persistent law violator carries no credentials which give him any claim to citizenship. The opportunities which this nation offers to new-comers is based upon orderly government. Every personal and property right we have is conditioned upon law and its enforcement. Have those who will not obey the laws which guarantee these blessings a right to ask for citizenship or to remain in a country made great and prosperous by constitutional and statutory enactment and their enforcement?

More Than Usual Number of Seats in Senate to be Filled Next November

Owing to death and resignation the number of contests for the Senate elections next November will be, as it stands today, 35, just three more than one-third of the Senate which is elected every two years.

Senators Crow and Pepper of Pennsylvania are serving under gubernatorial appointments, filling the places of the late Senators Knox and Penrose. Senator Rawson of Iowa is serving by appointment also, filling the vacancy made by the resignation of Judge Kenyon. America Spending a Million Dollars a Day For Veterans, More Than Any Other Nation

The United States government, through the Veterans' Bureau, is pouring out its funds at the rate of $1,000,000 for every day in the year and is doing more for former service men than any other country in the world.

The government just now is paying out $700 a year per man in cash for the purchase of medical treatment and other benefits for former service men and their dependents who are in need of assistance.

A total of 649,588 persons are on the rolls of the Veterans' Bureau as beneficiaries. This year the Bureau will spend $438,122,400 to buy direct and indirect aid for former service men and their relatives. Next year the Bureau plans to spend $455,232,702, according to the budget estimate now before Congress.

Only one other item of government expenditure for next year exceeds that proposed for the Veterans' Bureau. This is interest on the public debt, which will total more than $900,000,000. For the Navy department the government plans to spend only $370,000,000 next year, or $85,000,000 less than for the Veterans' Bureau. The giant pension list of the United States next year will total $252,350,000 in addition to the cash to be paid out by the Veterans' Bureau.

Since its establishment—at first under the title of the War Risk Insurance Bureau—the Veterans' Bureau has paid out a total of $1,259,930,730 on account of former service men and their dependents. This is the total expenditure up to January 1. A small army of clerks and accountants is kept busy daily in the Bureau, keeping track of the vast disbursements and the millions of checks mailed.

How the money was disbursed is shown in the following table prepared by Director Forbes: Vocational training, $212,724,533; insurance, $283,286,606; compensation, $300,141,767; allowances, $282,049,110 marine and seamen's insurance, $35,084,378; medical and hospital service, $99,566,243, and administrative, $47,078,092. The total is $1,259,930,730.

There are now on the rolls of the veteran's bureau a total of 649,588 persons who are receiving cash or for whom money is being paid out for service and other benefits on account of service during the great war.

These persons are classified as follows: Receiving vocational training, 107,478; compensation, 361,113; insurance, 150,107, and hospital treatment, 30,890.

In addition to its other benefits, the veterans' bureau is operating for ex-service men a gigantic insurance business with no administrative cost to those insured. Insurance in force totals more than $3,500,000,000. Up to February 28, the bureau had disbursed more than $300,000,000 in insurance benefits.

A New Promise of Peace at This Easter Time

Thousands of these posters are carrying their Easter season message from the National Council for Reduction of Armaments:

"Everywhere the earth is seeking to renew its life in the path of the great war's devastation. Men themselves are again taking hope and daring to feel the promise and joy in life. Not my life nor your life, but all life—its hope, its promise, its opportunity for the realization of the longing in the souls of men, is sacred. War is the great blasphemy against life."

This is the thought that the Council hopes the Easter season will leave uppermost in the minds of all men and women, according to Frederick J. Libby, its executive secretary, in a recent Washington interview.

Provisions of Bonus Bill

As passed by the House the Bonus Bill would provide for immediate cash payment to veterans whose adjusted service pay would not exceed $50 and would give to other veterans the option of these four plans:

Adjusted service certificates, with provisions authorizing loans by banks in the first three years after next October 1 and by the government thereafter; the certificates to run for twenty years and to have a face value at maturity of the amount of the adjusted service credit at the rate of $1 a day for domestic service and $1.25 a day for foreign service, increased by 25 per cent. plus interest at the rate of 4½ per cent compounded annually.

Vocational training aid after January 1, 1923, at the rate of $1.75 a day, the total payments not to exceed, however, 140 per cent of the adjusted service credit.

Farm and home aid, under which veterans purchase or improve farms or homes would be paid after July 1, 1923, a sum equal to their adjusted service credit, increased by 25 per cent.

Land settlement, under which land would be reclaimed under the supervision of a special board and farm units established for sale to the veterans at a price fixed by the board less the amount of the adjusted service credit due the purchasers.

Department of Justice Requested to Take Over Activities of Social Hygiene Board

The United States Interdepartment Social Hygiene Board, at a recent meeting, unanimously voted to request the Department of Justice to take over the activities now being carried on by the Board.

Representatives of six national organizations of women attended the meeting and urged the continuance of the constructive, preventative work such as has been done by the Board since its creation.

Dr. Valeria H. Parker is the executive secretary of the Board.

Constantinople Inaugurates Drive For Prohibition

A drive for prohibition is being made in Constantinople by a Turkish committee organized to fight the use of alcohol, it is reported. Pictures showing results of intemperance are exhibited in the movies. A determined attempt to limit the drinking places in the city is to be made, and newspaper owners will be asked to reject liquor advertising.

Quiet on the Streets Due to Absence of Intoxicated Persons

The New York Herald refers to one noticeable result of prohibition in New York City, namely, the quiet in the principal streets and the absence of intoxicated persons. This paper says: "Since prohibition the saloons, of which there were some 6,000 in New York, have almost disappeared as far as the general public knows. The business of selling liquor in hotels and cafes has dropped almost to zero, and casual drinking, of which there was a great amount in the city prior to prohibition, is virtually unknown. Even in New York City, now, the taking of a drink is, to the participants, an event of at least some importance."

Platform of Gifford Pinchot Includes Prohibition

The platform of Gifford Pinchot in his candidacy for the governorship of Pennsylvania gives in brief and direct terms his aims. As quoted by the Philadelphia North American, if elected governor of the state, Mr. Pinchot pledges himself to use the full power of his office to "drive all saloons out of the state and to prevent and punish bootlegging."

Ten Breweries Closed in Philadelphia

According to a press dispatch, ten breweries in the city of Philadelphia are finding that it does not pay to disobey the law. They have been closed by prohibition authorities pending payment of fines and penalties of thousands of dollars. The charge made against the proprietors is that beer containing more alcohol than the law allows has been manufactured.

Bishop Manning of New York Urges Support of Dry Law

Bishop William T. Manning, head of the Episcopal Diocese of New York, recently clearly stated his position with regard to the enforcement of prohibition. "I have never been in theory a prohibitionist," said the bishop, according to the New York Herald. "I do not agree with the extremists who say that to drink wine or beer is a sin in itself. From actual observation in the army, however, I believe that prohibition will be of great practical and moral benefit to the life of our country. From information coming to me from many sources I believe that prohibition is working great moral and practical benefit in the homes and conditions of life among the working people of our country as a whole.

"But the question now is not whether we believe or not in prohibition, but whether we believe in keeping the law of the land. Upon this question there is no room for two opinions. If we disapprove the prohibition laws we have the right to say so, and to work for their repeal. But none of us has the right to evade or disobey the law as it stands, and we cannot do this without working grave harm to our national life..... I call upon all our clergy and upon all our people, whatever their religion, to stand with their whole strength for the sacred principle of respect for law, upon which the life of our country depends."

Shaw Defends the Total Abstainer

Under the above heading the Boston Herald prints a most interesting statement from G. B. Shaw, who writes in response to a request from the editor of the Westminister Gazette on Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch's recent statement that the total abstainer, and more particularly the life-long abstainer is, in the nature of things, imperfectly equipped for high literature, and his challenge to the Wesleyan president to enumerate a list of half a dozen great poets and another list of half a dozen critics who have been total abstainers. The noted author says:

"'Q' forgets Shelley and me, but his proposition that alcohol affects the extension of manhood is flatly contrary to obvious facts. Six drops of any alcoholic liquid will depreciate a man's critical acumen by 10 per cent. That is what people take alcohol for, it dulls their self-criticism and also their criticism of their surroundings, making them happy and silly. If it had the opposite effect the world would go dry at once. The world does not appeal from Philip sober to Philip drunk when it wants a sound judgment, which it seldom does.

"Shakespeare, who knew what he was talking about, said that the effect of drink on man was to steal away his brains. If 'Q' really said that it added another inch of gray matter, then I want to know how much 'Q' had had when he said it."

Former Federal Prohibition Commissioner Kramer Sounds Alarm

John R. Kramer, former Federal prohibition commissioner, who recently toured the state of Missouri under the auspices of the Anti-Saloon League of America, in one of his lectures declared, as quoted by the Springfield (Mo.) Leader, "that the enforcement of prohibition is only a matter of a few years, for within a short period the coming generation will take charge of the affairs of the nation, and that generation will have little knowledge of the appetite for liquor, due to the fact that the manner in which it is now sold attracts no one but the man who has an unusually strong appetite for the same."

Mr. Kramer sounded an alarm to the supporters of prohibition and pointed out the following mistakes made by them:

"1. Slacking up of efforts of the supporters of prohibition after the passage of the law.

"2. Leaving the enforcement to the Federal government.

"3. Lack of interest of local officers in the law's enforcement.

"4. Feeling by the prohibition supporters that they have won, and a 'cocksure' feeling as to the ground that has been gained."

Portland Chamber Stands Pat On Volstead Act

Relief from the Volstead act will not be sought by the Portland (Oregon) Chamber of Commerce, following the decision of the board of directors of the organization, announced a few days ago, says the Oregon Journal (daily). "Recently the San Francisco chamber issued a referendum to its members and the Bay City business men went on record almost unanimously in favor of light wines and beer. San Francisco then asked for Portland's opinion. In replying, the directors said that Oregon had chosen prohibition two years before the national law became effective, and that this was evidence enough that the state desired continuance of the dry laws, independent of what relief might be accorded through national enactments."

Bishop Garland Makes Patriotic Appeal

The Law Enforcement League, recently organized in the city of Philadelphia, has been heartily endorsed by Bishop Garland, of the Episcopal diocese of Pennsylvania, in a letter published by the Philadelphia North American. We quote in part:

"I cannot understand how Christians can be sponsors for acts of disobedience to the law of our country as written in our Constitution. Especially should this be true of members of our church, who from the earliest days of infancy are taught to pray for those in authority over us, who are brought up to be law-abiding citizens.

"I am in hearty sympathy with the Eighteenth Amendment, but even if I were not, I would feel it my bounden duty to support the Constitution of my country and to deprecate every effort to promote a spirit of lawlessness and disobedience.

"I sincerely hope you may be able to get all the women of our church to become members of the Law Enforcement League. I feel sure that all our women will be glad to lend their support to a league which desires to enforce the laws of our country, to give protection to our homes, to eliminate much crime and immorality and to free our country from lawlessness."

How Long Beach Feels About Prohibition

"We believe the growth, prosperity and welfare of our city have been materially benefited by the abolition and banishment of the liquor traffic," declares the city council of Long Beach, California, in response to the request of the Chicago "city fathers" that it pass a resolution in favor of a modification of the Volstead law to permit the return of wine and beer. The Long Beach council goes on to say, that it is its opinion "that if city, state and national legislative bodies were as strongly in sympathy with the impartial enforcement of the federal prohibition act and placed themselves on record to that effect, much of the illegal propaganda would cease." The council further resolved that "the federal prohibition act has our hearty support and a copy of these resolutions shall be forwarded to our Representatives in Washington, to our honorable governor, to the American Issue, to the National and state W. C. T. U.'s, to the National Prohibition Headquarters and to the California Voice."

HOW A W. C. T. U. AMERICANIZATION WORKER SPENDS HER DAYS

Mrs. Almyra L. Porter

In the Woods Run district, Pittsburgh, Pa., to which this article refers, live Russian, Jewish, Slavic, Polish, Hungarian, Lithuanian, Italian and Colored people. The housing is a great problem. There are tenements where a whole family live in one room. Some have three or four rooms, with from four to six children and perhaps from four to six boarders. In Petoskey Street, there is a row of twenty-four houses, each with four rooms. Carter Alley runs parallel with Petoskey Street and has the same number of houses and rooms. Their back yards open into a court where the washings have to be hung and yet this is the only place where the children can play. An old-time hydrant is the only water supply for most of the houses opening in that court. The majority of the women may be seen barefooted even in winter. They provide much of the fuel for the family by gathering wood which has been thrown away at the mills, carrying bundles of it on their backs.—Culla J. Vayhinger, National Director Americanization Department.

The mother in the home has not been given the same opportunities to become a real American that her more fortunate husband enjoys. She has the care of the house and the children, and unless someone comes to her home, she has very little chance to know how her American neighbors live. The husband can go to night school, and in the mills and shops he can learn English.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Allegheny county, Pennsylvania, has a worker who goes into the homes teaching the mothers not only to read and write, but also how to be a good neighbor. If you should go with her some morning, she might take you to a Jewish home. The father is a tailor and there are two daughters. The family live in two rooms. The mother will be eager to take her lesson for she wants to be able to do all things just like an American, to be able to read and write as it will help in the business. In the next home is a Slavic family, father and mother, five children and a nephew whose mother is dead. The father is eating his breakfast, after which he will clear the table and wash the dishes. (This is the only home where the man does such work.) The mother is washing and the teacher will find a chair, or bench, and sit down and wait until the mother brings the baby, and her books for the lesson. In a Polish home are father, mother and seven children living in three rooms. The teacher is welcome not only to teach English, but the woman wants to know how to sew; ready-made clothes are so expensive for the children. Sometimes one must become a mechanic as occasionally a sewing machine needs repairing. The next home consists of a father, mother and a baby. The mother is quite young, her husband has been drinking and has beaten her until both her eyes are blackened. She does not want to read or write today and comes and sits down to tell the teacher her troubles. She appreciates a friend who will sympathize with her. A Russian Jewish family, father, mother and three boys, live in two rooms. The father is a shoe-maker and the mother is eager to learn to read and write. She has succeeded so well that now she can write checks when they buy an order of goods from a wholesale house. She is very proud that she can do it. Previously, she had to get someone else who knew English to do this for her and she did not like to have her neighbors know how much money they had in the bank. A Hungarian family, father, mother and three children, occupy three rooms and have four boarders. These people are getting ready to go back to Poland. The mother does not want to leave America. She wants her children to go to school and get an education and be Americans.

Today the mother may want the teacher to go with her to see about renting a house. Perhaps she has a sick child and would like to have the Settlement House send a nurse to her home. The husband is sick and must go to the hospital, and the mother wants the teacher to see about getting free milk at the milk station for the baby. Another will want to know about getting her "Annie" in the Fresh Air Home in the country, another will ask help in getting her child into the kindergarten and another will want to be shown how to use patterns for making dresses.

There is a settlement house in the neighborhood with a library and the children are urged to go there and get books. The mothers have the privilege of a bath twice a week; some mothers go and take all the children, the older ones bathing first and then caring for the younger children. Of all the homes the teacher visits, only one has a bath tub.

The great problem before America today is the foreigner within our gates. We cannot all serve as foreign missionaries, but we can lend a helping hand at our very doors. Let us be good neighbors and try to teach them the way of salvation and get them to accept Jesus Christ as their Saviour.

The W. C. T. U. Mission For Mexicans in Carlsbad, New Mexico

Theo. Whiting

An unusually fine piece of Americanization work is being carried on by the W. C. T. U. of Carlsbad, a little town in the southeastern corner of New Mexico.

For three years they have been steadily gaining ground until now they have reached a place where they can extend their influence by installing a Sunday service for the children and adults and a weekly sewing class for the women. The Mexicans are asking for these and also for a night school for adults.

With great devotion a few women have met the children each Saturday afternoon during the three years, and taught them sewing, manual training, English, and Christian American ideals through song and story.

I was happy to visit them at their Christmas celebration and a week later at a regular meeting.

The old adobe church with its windows partly boarded up, the roof and walls needing repairs, looked most dilapidated, but inside all cracks and blemishes were hidden by the festive ornamentations.

It was a bit surprising to find the Christmas tree surrounded with Mexican decorations. The usual dark red and green were replaced by the paler red and green, which are the colors of Old Mexico. A hundred Mexican flags floated from the ceiling, and the half dozen American Stars and Stripes scattered around the room, attracted far less attention than did the framed portraits of leading Mexican men and women. No disrespect for America was meant. A very helpful, kindly man had surprised the teachers with the decorations and he had used what he had at hand.

The bright faced, dark skinned, shining eyed boys and girls were seated upon tiers of benches of their own making, placed at either side of the tree. As they sang most lustily, "Be k-i-n-d, kind" and recited the ten commandments and beatitudes, or marched in a drill, we visitors could see that they had been well trained and that the hours spent at the mission were bright spots in their lives. The entire program of songs, recitations, and exercises was very creditably given.

The Mexican who had done the decorating was present as were many other men and women—pleased to watch their children perform. Mrs. Chaves, a Christian Mexican woman, acted as interpreter for these older people and assisted Mrs. Prickett, the superintendent, and her helpers.

At the regular meeting the next Saturday, about forty were present. The

DELAWARE'S GOVERNOR SCORES THE CHICAGO COUNCIL'S BEER AND WINE RESOLUTION

REPLIES TO THE WILMINGTON CITY COUNCIL

When the city council of Chicago adopted a resolution demanding the return of beer and light wines, and instructed the city clerk to send copies to the councils of all cities in the country having a population of 25,000 or more, it was not at all prepared for the cold reception its proposal was to meet. Among those who expressed their disapproval in no unmistakable terms was Governor W. D. Denney of Delaware, who in a message to the city council of Wilmington said in part:

"The Eighteenth Amendment was duly ratified by thirty-six states, the requisite three-fourths of the whole number of states, which fact was duly proclaimed January 16, 1919. One year after said date the amendment under its terms became effective. My recollection is that since then the number of states have been increased to forty-six, leaving only two that have not ratified.

"The amendment thus becoming a part of the fundamental law of the land, Congress undertook to enforce the article by legislation which it deemed appropriate—the enactment of the Federal enforcement statute. The state of Delaware, having concurrent power with the Congress, likewise enacted legislation which in the judgment of the general assembly was deemed appropriate to give force and effect to the amendment within the state.

"It is this enforcement legislation which I assume the Chicago city council desires to have modified to the extent at least of allowing 'wholesome beer and light wine' to be manufactured, sold and distributed. And the council moreover desires the governor of the state, if the opportunity arises, to join in furthering this desire.

"It may be trite to say so, yet it would appear necessary to state a simple elementary truth of which I fear many people are ignorant, or, knowing it, impervious to. It is this: THAT THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES IS THE SUPREME LAW OF THE LAND.

"No Federal statutes, no treaties and no legislative enactments in the states can either nullify or impair it. All Federal and state officials are sworn to obey it and every citizen is not only legally but morally bound to respect it.

"Now, the Constitution prohibits the manufacture, sale or transportation of 'intoxicating liquors.' Beer and wine have always been regarded as intoxicating liquor. Courts everywhere throughout the land have repeatedly so decided. Statutes—Federal and state—cannot by legislative definition, make them otherwise. So that when the Chicago council advocates a proposal that the state should legalize the manufacture, sale and distribution of beer and wines, it in substance advocates a violation of the Constitution of the United States.

"The council may, if it sees fit, champion such a proposal. I shall not. This I shall not do for at least two reasons. First, I am among those who, endeavoring to accord to the Constitution of our country the fullest measure of devotion, believe that the amendment in question should be honestly fortified by effective legislation.

"I am opposed to any scheme that would emasculate it by hostile enactment. Of course, the Congress and the legislators in the states have the power, if they choose to exercise it, to embark upon a program that means a deliberate purpose to refuse to support the Constitution by effective laws. Having sworn to defend and support it, however, I do not think self-respecting legislators would pursue such a faithless course.

"Second. If the legislature of any state should be so emboldened as to embark upon such a venture of practical nullification, it would attempt the impossible, for its enactment would immediately fail, because of its unconstitutionality.

"Inasmuch as the council has assumed to suggest to me what I ought to do in the premises, I may perhaps be permitted to reciprocate by assuming to make a suggestion to the council.

"My suggestion is: That instead of passing such resolutions, the best interests of the state would be better subserved if the council should, in resolutions, declare that the Constitution and laws ought to be honestly and conscientiously obeyed by all citizens everywhere, and if the same are not being obeyed, call upon all the people to rally to their defense."

The Labor Interests Misrepresented It

To any one who is accustomed to think things through, the statement of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor, as given out by the Associated Press, concerning the modification of the Volstead act so as to permit the sale of light wines and beer, is nothing short of amazing in its hint of compromise with the anarchistic element in the nation, and amazing, yes, most amazing, in the appeal with which it concludes. But, perhaps the most absurd position taken by the executive council of the A. F. L. is that, since we have an "army of bootleggers," "thousands of "moonshiners," "increase in crime and insanity," "increase in unemployment," "increase in taxes" and a few more things, the one and only remedy for them is to allow the bootleggers and the moonshiners to operate legally. Just modify the laws so that they can legally sell light wines and beer and then we will have no trouble at all. Nobody will think of wanting to sell rye or corn or anything at all but the legal drinks. Can any sane, thinking man believe this for one moment? Use the same reasoning for other laws that we have. I read an editorial in the Chronicle only a few days ago, in which it was claimed that one hundred million dollars' worth of automobiles were stolen yearly. The article stated that "Many laws with heavy penalties attached have been enacted. Many arrests have been made, but it is difficult to secure convictions, and no perceptible slackening of the lawlessness is apparent." Let the executive council prescribe. Would it be this? "Call upon all citizens to help in having a law passed which will permit the legal stealing of Fords and Chevrolets"? Why not? Surely, this vast army of law-breakers must not be tolerated and our taxes will be increased or have been increased immensely in the effort to apprehend and convict these law-breakers; therefore legalize the theft of Fords and Chevrolets and we will have no further trouble. The law would be so much easier to enforce. The big cars can be so much more easily identified and so on and so on.

But it is not the easiest thing in the world to fool the average laboring man. This is not the first time the leaders of the Federation have tried to influence the rank and file against the prohibitory law and, to the eternal credit of many a labor union in dear old Georgia be it said, they refused to pass resolutions "suggested" by these leaders and stood true and firm "For God and Home and Native Land." We do not believe that in Georgia or elsewhere American Labor is going to endorse the movement of the executive council to license light wines and beer.

Benefits of Prohibition Tremendous, Says Miss Hopley

"There is no pretense that prohibition has settled all of life's problems, but the benefit from it has been tremendous," says Miss Georgia Hopley, first woman United States prohibition agent, according to the Racine (Wis.) Call. "From everywhere come reports of improved conditions—civic, domestic, social, physical, mental, moral, financial and spiritual," she continued. "School superintendents are unanimous in their opinion that continuation of enforcement means better rising Americans. They report pupils healthier and happier, more punctual and thrifty, with fewer echoes of trouble at home. Social workers state their experience with families shows that the difficulties formerly met with, occasioned by intemperance and alcoholism, have almost entirely disappeared."

Discussing the enforcement of the dry amendment, she says: "The only way to have respect for the law is to see that people obey the law. It is not what one wants or does not want, individually, but what is on the statute books, for enforcement is the question which should be uppermost. The disrespecter of law is the disrespecter of government. While sober facts show a remarkable indication on the part of the people at large to respect the Eighteenth amendment, the rebellion against it in other quarters and the evil effect are obvious.

"I am just now answering through the press a statement made by a representative on the floor of congress that 'for the past few years conditions under prohibition have been nothing but straight hell,' by quoting the highest authority of the nation, President Harding, who stated recently:

" 'In every community men and women have had an opportunity now to know what prohibition means. They know that debts are more promptly paid, families better fed and clothed, and more money finds its way into the savings banks. The liquor traffic was destructive of much that was most precious in American life. In another generation I believe that liquor will have disappeared not only from our politics but from our memories.' "

BIG-CITY EXECUTIVES BOOSTERS OF PROHIBITION

DECLARE IT TO BE OF PRONOUNCED BENEFIT TO HEALTH AND HAPPINESS

Galveston's Mayor Emphatic in Approval of Dry Law

"GOOD! GOOD! GOOD!" is the way the mayor of Galveston, Texas, Hon. Charles A. Kenan, replies to the question asked him in a letter from THE UNION SIGNAL, as to his opinion regarding the effect of prohibition on the health, the happiness and the prosperity of Texas' big city. He unqualifiedly states that the dry law has been a big factor in reducing the drunkenness and the class of offenses that accompany that evil, and that it has also caused a decrease in crime. To the query as to its beneficial effect on juvenile delinquency and on domestic relations, he registers a positive affirmative. He believes that the law has been of advantage in the big industries in promoting greater efficiency and more steady work on the part of employes. He also affirms that he believes prohibition has promoted thrift, as indicated by increased savings in the banks.

Prohibition a Money-Saver, Says Lincoln's Mayor

Personally, I believe in prohibition and cast my vote to make Lincoln dry many years before the movement became nation-wide. I believe that prohibition of the public sale of liquor has been a good thing for a great many people. It has reduced the number of arrests greatly in this city but I can't say it has reduced crime to any great extent. I believe that a great deal of money that formerly went for liquor has been put into the savings bank and into buying homes, I do not believe that we will feel the real effect of prohibition until this generation has passed on, but the younger generation now growing up will not be subject to the temptation that this generation has had.

FRANK C. ZEHRUNG,
Mayor of Lincoln, Nebraska.

Baltimore Notes Decrease in Drunkenness and Crime

Replying to your letter of March 1 to the mayor of Baltimore, which has been referred to me, I beg to say that prohibition has been a benefit to the city of Baltimore by lessening the number of arrests for drunkenness and assault, and especially diminishing crimes of impulse caused by drink.

When the law first went into effect, the decrease in the number of inmates in the lodging houses became so marked that many were closed To a certain extent, these lodging houses are again being used, probably largely due to business depression.

The law has been of advantage in the big industries in promoting efficiency and more steady work on the part of employes. The effects generally on the community have been beneficial, but drinking among a certain class has probably increased. Many men drink now who prior to the law did not indulge, simply because it is more difficult to obtain intoxicants, and it is considered clever by some to be able to out-general the law.

NATHANIEL G. GRASTY,
Secretary Board of Supervisors of City Charities.

Nashville Finds Dry Law an Advantage From All Points of View

The mayor of Nashville, Tennessee, Hon. Felix Z. Wilson, gives decided approval to the dry law as it has affected the city over which he presides as chief executive. His replies to questions asked him by THE UNION SIGNAL read as follows:

1. Has prohibition of the liquor traffic been of benefit to your city?
Yes.

2. Has it reduced drunkenness and the class of offenses that accompany that evil? Has it reduced crime?
Yes.

3. Has it had any effect on juvenile delinquency? On domestic relations?
Yes.

4. Has it affected the unemployment situation and have the charity organizations and those agencies that look after the poor noted any difference in the number of people who needed help?
Would be much worse under old conditions.

5. Has the law been of advantage in the big industries in promoting greater efficiency and more steady work on the part of employes?
Yes.

6. Has prohibition promoted the thrift movement as indicated by increased savings in your banks?
I would think so.

7. What in your opinion has been the effect of prohibition on the health, happiness and prosperity of your community?
Good.

Population of Workhouse Decreases in Louisville

Mr. N. A. Palmer, replying for Hon. Houston Quin, mayor of Louisville, Kentucky, to a letter inquiring as to the effect of prohibition on that city, gives the following significant facts and figures:

"Your first question, 'Has prohibition of the liquor traffic been of benefit to your city?' can be answered very definitely in the affirmative. This fact will be of interest to you in this connection. In 1908, when there were 903 saloons, the president of the Board of Public Safety of our city made the statement, which was published in one of our dailies, that they had been investigating and found that there were 400 places in the city where they were selling liquor without license, and gave notice that unless the sale of liquor in them was stopped they would be compelled to pay the regular license fee; and at this time without any licensed saloons there cannot be found more than half as many illicit places as there were according to this official statement at the time when there were nine hundred and three licensed saloons.

"I submit to you that while this is not ideal, we have made tremendous progress in that direction. The following figures comparing the last year with saloons and the first year without saloons is also significant:

"The last year before national prohibition, arrests for drunkenness in the city of Louisville, were 6,809; the first year after national prohibition, arrests for drunkenness were 1,061. The last year before national prohibition, commitments to the workhouse for drunkenness were 2,022; the first year after national prohibiton, commitments for drunkenness, 376.

"It would be impossible without careful inquiry to answer the remaining questions except in generalities, but I do not hesitate to say that there could not have been other than very decided improvement in each of the other lines when a change had come that brought about the comparative figures furnished."

Des Moines Mayor Characterizes Prohibition as Highly Valuable to Health and Welfare of Community

The opinion of Hon. H. H. Barton, mayor of Des Moines, Iowa, as to the effect of prohibition on his city is stated in the following strong words:

"It has been of incalculable value to the health and welfare of the community."

Of prohibition as a thrift promoter, he says: "Savings materially increased." In regard to the general effect on civic life: "Juvenile delinquency has decreased. The number of cases of intoxication is probably smaller; number of cases of alcohol poisoning larger." Of the unemployment situation, the mayor says: "Unemployment conditions are undeniably worse with the open saloon." As to the greater efficiency of employes in big industries, he replies: "Cannot say from personal experience. Have an idea it has promoted efficiency, however."

Better Home Conditions Inevitable Result of Prohibition, Says Bridgeport

Prohibition of the liquor traffic has been a benefit to the city of Bridgeport. It has reduced drunkenness and many of the resultant evils thereof. Unemployment in Bridgeport, as in every other industrial center, is unusually prevalent at the present time, and it is, therefore difficult to determine just what the effect of prohibition might be on the particular phase of our city life. It is inevitable that with less drunkenness the home life of many as well as the efficiency for the daily work will be improved.

N. FAHEY,
Secretary to Fred Atwater, Mayor
Bridgeport, Connecticut.

Fort Worth Executive O. K.'s Prohibition

Answering the question, "Has prohibition promoted thrift as indicated by increased savings in your banks?" H. E. R. Cockrell, mayor of Fort Worth, Texas, says, "My opinion is, it has." As to the beneficial effect of prohibition in his city, he replies with a definite "Yes". And concerning the beneficial effect on juvenile delinquency, answers, "I am of the opinion that it has had such an effect." He expresses the belief that under prohibition "there are fewer needing help," and that it has caused a decrease in drunkenness and offenses growing out of drunkenness and alcoholism.

WORK FOR A DOUBLED MEMBERSHIP!

He Was Convinced!

"Yesterday at a meeting," writes Mrs. Josie Sizer, president of the Minnesota W. C. T. U., "my hostess brought in a man who, while favoring prohibition, felt that the law never can be enforced. I was glad to be able to tell him that the law is being enforced, and to show him statistics to prove it. He wanted to know where I got the facts, and I told him from THE UNION SIGNAL. I showed him the paper, calling special attention to the legislative page. He was interested at once, and subscribed."

WORLD'S W. C. T. U. CONVENTION, PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA, NOVEMBER 11-16, 1922
NATIONAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION, ATLANTIC CITY, NEW JERSEY, NOVEMBER 18-23, 1922

Of Course Abraham Lincoln Never Said It!

The effort of the opponents of prohibition to convince the people that Abraham Lincoln were he living would line up with them in their campaign against the Eighteenth Amendment is pathetic. In a circular sent out by the Association throughout the country they give the following statement as purporting to have been used by Abraham Lincoln:

"Prohibition will work great injury to the cause of temperance. It is a species of intemperance within itself, for it goes beyond the bounds of reason, in that it attempts to control men's appetites by legislation and makes a crime of things that are not crimes. A prohibition law strikes a blow at the very principles on which our government was founded. I have always been found laboring to protect the weaker from the stronger, and I never can give my consent to such a law as you propose to enact."

Investigation as to the authenticity of this statement was made years ago by Rev. Duncan C. Milner of Chicago. He sent copies of it to John Hay and J. C. Nicolay, Lincoln's great biographers who collected and edited his complete works. They replied that they had never found anything to warrant the statement and referred to Mr. Lincoln's great temperance speech in 1842 as giving his real sentiments. Officials of the liquor societies were asked where the quotation was to be found but none of them could tell of any edition of Lincoln's speeches where it appeared. At last, however, the false statement seems to have been traced to its source. The Rev. Duncan C. Milner, in an open letter dated March 26, 1922, published in the Chicago Tribune, tells its history, as follows:

"It made its first public appearance in an anti-saloon campaign in Atlanta, Georgia, in 1887. A circular was issued addressed to the Negroes and appealing to them in the name of their emancipator. The handbills were headed in large letters, 'For Liberty: Abraham Lincoln's Proclamation.' Underneath was a picture of a Negro kissing Lincoln's hand, which was striking off his shackles, and then the professed quotation. A few days ago Dr. Sam Small, the noted evangelist and lecturer, told me that he was in the Atlanta campaign in 1887, that the man who invented this false message confessed the fact to him. Mr. Small says he is ready to make his affidavit to this statement. This might settle the question."

This disclosure of the origin of the false statement, used so widely by the liquor interests, ought to be given extended publicity.

Are You Really Patriotic?

It was at a club meeting. The W. C. T. U. member was anxious to enlist the club folk in a concerted movement for a mass meeting of the women of the town to further law observance, so she skillfully led the conversation of a group, among whom she was seated, to the question of prohibition. She began: "Do you believe in the Eighteenth Amendment?"

"Why, of course we do!" was the astonished exclamation, in full chorus.

"What do you think of its enforcement?" she asked, and again the reply was prompt:

"Why, it's got to be enforced. Of course it must be enforced."

"But," said the W. C. T. U. member, feeling her way toward the hoped-for meeting, "don't you believe that in order to have the amendment enforced as it should be, you and I must be careful to observe minor regulations? If we expect others to observe that law, we shall have to respect the other laws."

Waiting for an equally hearty response to this most logical conclusion, she was amazed when a woman beside her—a prominent woman, a splendid woman, too—one who would have been insulted had anyone suggested that she was otherwise than a patriotic American—drew herself up, and said most emphatically, and as a matter of course:

"Well, I know one thing. I never obey a single law or regulation, unless it suits my comfort and convenience to do so!"

"An extreme case," you say, then you add, "Surely, no self-respecting woman in America would confess herself among the anarchists, where such a statement would inevitably place her."

In our work for law enforcement and law observance, and particularly for reverence for law, as the foundation upon which the others must be built, we may well submit our own lives to a rigid self-examination on this very point in order that, if we deliberately ignore minor rulings, we may not think ourselves superior to those persons brought into courts for law-breaking. Surely, in the sight of God, Who sees into our hearts and knows the many opportunities we have been given, we shall be held to a strict accounting.

The great need for continued work with children, young people, and older folks, too, in order to create a due regard for law, was seen by Lincoln when he voiced his famous lines concerning reverence for law. This point is earnestly stressed by our educators and welfare workers as they plan for the years when those now growing to manhood and womanhood must bear the burdens of the world. Always, thoughtful leaders have taught that law must be obeyed for the good of all. The only deliverance from what may seem at times its galling bonds lies in our being *im*pelled, instead of *com*pelled, to obedience because we love God and our fellow-man.

In sending money to the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union to THE UNION SIGNAL, or the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, please either send a draft on Chicago or New York, a postoffice money order, or add five cents to pay cost of exchange on checks or drafts on local banks. Cashier's or certified checks are not exempt from this charge, which is made necessary by the ruling of the Chicago Clearing House, through which all checks sent to us pass for collection.

RELIGIOUS INTOLERANCE A MENACE, SAYS THE PRESIDENT

President Harding, in an address at Calvary Baptist Church, Washington, D. C., as quoted by the press declared that in his experience of a year in the White House there had come to him no other such unwelcome impression as the "manifest religious intolerance which exists among many of our citizens and I hold it to be a menace to the very liberties we boast and cherish." He declared his belief in the part which religious reverence has played in American achievement. "My prayer for this republic tonight," he said, "is to reconsecrate us in religious devotion and make us abidingly a God-fearing and God-loving people."

In referring to the disregard for law, the President said: "Without giving too much weight to alarmist expressions, there is a very apparent tendency to a lighter and a more frivolous view of the citizen's relations to both the church and the state. We can hardly hope for a restoration of the old ideals in religion and in moral conduct, so long as this tendency to disregard the law shall continue. It is absolutely essential to the maintenance of a secure society and to the attainment of a proper moral plane, that the law should be recognized as sacred and supreme. It should have at its back and enlisted in its support every element of the community that realizes the desirability of sound, secure and stable institutions. Disregard of one statute inevitably must breed a lack of respect for the law in general. This tendency is obvious, and ought to give the deepest concern to people who have seen, in this world, the fearful results that may flow from the breakdown of respect for the social fundamentals."

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awakening continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising evermore."

Women's Organizations Co-operate in Near East Relief

The Women's Emergency Committee, headed by Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, is endeavoring to raise a special fund for the relief of the children of the Near East. This committee was formed by fifty of the prominent women of America, representing the leading national women's organizations, to meet the financial crisis in the Near East, which necessitated a twenty-five percent cut in all appropriations and practically condemns to death 25,000 helpless children who are now dependent on American charity. The National W. C. T. U. is represented on this committee by Miss Anna Adams Gordon, its president. It is the object of the committee not so much to solicit large contributions from a few, though the call is for every woman to give her utmost, but to ask all women to give something. Coupon books, each representing the life of one of the 25,000 children who now face death, are being sent out over the country.

All contributions should be sent to Mrs. Margaret C. Munns, National W. C. T. U. treasurer.

Congressmen Know All About Frances E. Willard

In one of the leading illustrated articles in the April issue of The Ladies' Home Journal, "The Most Powerful Lobby in Washington," complimentary mention is made of Mrs. Lenna Lowe Yost and Dr. Valeria Parker, as representatives of the W. C. T. U. Their pictures appear among those of women who are exercising a wholesome influence on Congress.

"Statuary Hall itself is, for the most part, a museum of memorials to ideas and tendencies which the country rapidly is outgrowing," remarks Charles A. Selden, in the same article. "The one modern note, because it is the woman note, in the collection upstairs is in the figure of Frances E. Willard, placed there by Illinois, the only favorite daughter in a circle of favored sons. She is wedged in between John Corrie, M. D., of Florida, and Thomas Hart Benton of Missouri. Who remembers Corrie? Or is it Gorrie? The stone cutter was careless in chiseling the first letter of the name. He was selected by Florida as her representative in this hall of fame because he had invented an ice machine. He is not in the books of American biography. And who, except the historian, remembers Benton? He is not so far back but that twenty years of his life overlapped the time of Miss Willard. But there is no man in Senate or House today who does not know all about her. The thing which she fought for, and which her successors won, is today still a great issue in Congress between those who would destroy it and those who know that the fight to keep it alive is not yet over."

Germany Restricts Alcohol As Medicine

Physicians employed by the new sickness insurance society of Wurtemberg, Germany, are not allowed much latitude in prescribing alcoholic liquors, according to an item in an educational periodical published by the Deutsche Verein gegen der Alkoholismus (Oct.-Nov., 1921). Alcoholic drinks, such as red wine, Malaga, German sparkling wine, are to be ordered only in very urgent cases and then after the physician has assured himself of the scientific reasons for the prescription. They are never to be given as a general tonic.

Medicated wines can be replaced by other corresponding medicines. The addition of southern wines to mixtures and the employment of alcoholic iron extracts are forbidden.

The Aaronic Benediction

Used by the W. C. T. U. at Meetings

The Lord bless thee, and keep thee. The Lord make His face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee. The Lord lift up His countenance upon thee, and give thee peace. Num. 6:24, 25, 26.

Risen!

When in the starry gloom
They sought the Lord Christ's tomb,
Two angels stood in sight,
All dressed in dazzling white,
Who unto the women said,
"Why seek ye the living among the dead?"

O ye of this latter day,
Who journey the selfsame way
Through morning's twilight gloom
Back to the shadowy tomb;
To you, as to them, was it said,
"Why seek ye the living among the dead?"

The Lord is risen indeed,
He is here for your love, for your need—
Not in the grave, or the sky,
But here where men live and die
And true the word that was said,
"Why seek ye the living among the dead?"

Wherever are tears and sighs,
Wherever are children's eyes,
Where man calls man his brother,
And loves as himself another,
Christ lives! The angels said,
"Why seek ye the living among the dead?"

—Richard Watson Gilder.

Hear the parable of Easter; the parable of the healing waters, the awakening sun, the risen Christ. In dry valleys desolate stretches of sage brush need only the touch of the waters stored in the mountains to become gardens and fruitful orchards. The cold fields, bare and sodden, burst into bloom under the fingers of the sun. The heart of man, long numbed with pain and sin, trembles into life with the coming of Christ. We have water enough and sun enough and gospel enough to transfigure the earth. We need to become channels of blessing.

Kansas Holds Rousing Executive Committee Meeting

Special Correspondence

The official board meeting for the eastern section of Kansas, held recently in Topeka, proved both profitable and enjoyable.

After earnest discussion, it was recommended that enough money be borrowed from the Patriotic Fund to purchase the film, "Safeguarding the Nation." The use of this motion picture is to be offered to every county in the state at a charge which, while very low, will in a short time bring in returns sufficient to replace the amount expended, after which the film will be a source of income.

Stimulation of the public conscience on the subject of law enforcement, through a Star in the Window campaign, was another important matter considered, and the following plans to promote the distribution of the cards were adopted: Choose a special Sunday on which to ask every minister to speak for a few minutes on the subject of law enforcement, following his remarks with an announcement that a supply of the star window cards will be found in the vestibule in charge of a member of the W. C. T. U., one of the stars to be fastened on the front of the pulpit. Invite everyone to take as many as they will distribute to their neighbors. If practicable, ask for an offering for W. C. T. U. work. Secure the interest of newspaper men, and two or three days before the Sunday selected for action by the ministers, have the star reproduced in the papers, if possible, in connection with a stirring article explaining the plan and purpose of the campaign. On Monday, have members of the unions distribute stars to be placed in the windows of business houses.

The use of the Swedish Bethel church had been courteously offered, and the board met in this very pretty and convenient building. Mrs. Lillian M. Mitchner, our state W. C. T. U. president, presided and gave as the keynote of the gathering the word "Service". Cordial greetings were brought by the president of the hostess county, Mrs. Clara Baker.

Mrs. Elizabeth A. Perkins, national director of Child Welfare, and Mrs. Laura Parks Miller, national director of Women in Industry, were present at the meeting, and gave great inspiration and assistance. Their poster exhibits demonstrated to the women the variety and value of the helps which may be obtained from the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House.

The symposium—five minute papers by county presidents—revealed considerable and varied talent. Mrs. L. L. Leffler, of Bourbon county, won the prize, a beautiful W. C. T. U. pin, in the first group—subject, "Our 1922 Goal." Mrs. Mattie Grimmett of Lyons, whose paper was given in the form of a parable, carried off the honors in the second group—"How Can the W. C. T. U. Improve the Morals of the County?" The third group had for its theme, "Law Enforcement." Mrs. Leah Thomas, of Osage, was the winner. Mrs. Sena Hartzell Wallace, state superintendent of Americanization, was awarded the silver pin in the symposium on department work conducted in the afternoon.

A resolution requesting the "elimination from moving picture films of portrayals of women smoking, irrespective of class distinction, it being suggested that on the screen it is not possible to determine whether the woman represented smoking is a denizen of the underworld or a member of respectable society," was adopted and ordered sent to Mr. Will H. Hays.

Judge Wark, prohibition enforcement officer for Kansas, gave an enthusiastic talk on "Respect for Law" and Justice John Marshall, of the Kansas Supreme Court, made a stirring address in which he said with emphasis, "The prohibitory law is being enforced," and declared that it would continue to be enforced.

More than 200 persons were present at the evening banquet. Most excellent addresses were given by the two national directors, Mrs. Perkins and Mrs. Miller, by Dr. Kulp, pastor of the First M. E. church, Judge Wark, Justice John Marshall, Mrs. W. A. Johnston, and Mr. Griffith, assistant attorney general, who represented Attorney General Hopkins and Mr. Fred Crabbe of the Anti-Salo League, both of whom had been call out of town on official business. M Mitchner, as toastmistress, presided ve graciously.

At the last meeting of the offic board, Mrs. Sparks, president of Wy dotte county, told of the great hea conference to be held in Kansas Ci Kansas, in April, at which the W. C. U. has been offered space for an hibit. Twenty-five dollars was app priated to help make as attractive a play as possible.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

OUR RALLY CRIES: 5,000 NEW MEMBERS, 500 NEW BRANCHES AND 500,000 SIGNATURES TO THE POLYGLOT PETITION

Maude B. Perkins, National Y. P. B. Secretary

"If you want to live in the kind of a town
That's the kind of a town you like,
You don't have to slip your clothes in a grip,
And go on a long, long hike,
For you'll find what you left behind,
As there's nothing really new—
It's a knock at yourself if you knock your town,
For it isn't your town, it's you.

"Real towns are not made by man afraid
Lest somebody else gets ahead;
If everybody works and nobody shirks,
You can raise a town from the dead.
And if when you make your personal stake
Your neighbor makes one, too,
Your town will be what you want to see,
For it isn't your town, it's you."

This little rhyme, given by Dr. Emma F. A. Drake, president of the Idaho (South) W. C. T. U., has made a deep impression on my mind and I wish its message might become a conviction to every member of our Young People's Branch. Never before have we so much needed loyal, patriotic young people. I am convinced that "the noblest word in the catalogue of virtue is loyalty"—loyalty to American ideals, American standards and American laws. It has been suggested that the punishment for liquor law violators should be to have their right to vote (under laws they despise) taken away from them, and I believe it would be a fair punishment.

Citizenship should be measured by our allegiance to law. We talk about Christian citizenship. Citizenship is a department of religion. No man can be a good Christian who is a poor citizen. It is a basic principle. Why not apply this standard to our Y. P. B. work and at this crucial time in our history line up every young man and woman of Y. P. B. age to enroll as members that we may meet the opposition of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment? They are enlisting (with dollar dues) as many as possible in an effort to show the strength of the sentiment in the United States against prohibition. Why not during our April campaign month seek to enroll (with fifty cent dues) many of America's young citizens to show the strength of sentiment in favor of prohibition, and then go even further than that and secure 500,000 signatures to the Polyglot Petition in favor of World Prohibition.

Oh, young people of America, if in some way I could inspire you to believe in yourselves! Someone has said that we are using only twenty per cent of our opportunities, our talents, our education. Know yourself and then with a determination to make the world better, go out to use one hundred per cent of all that you possess to make your town, your state, and your nation the finest in all the world.

President Harding has well summed up some of the conditions we find today. He is reported to have said that much of our present day trouble is the result of "moral laxity, shifting standards, and a weakening of the sterner fibres."

In this crisis in our history I would call upon America's young womanhood and young manhood to rally. It is only too true that nations have begun to decay because of moral decadence. "The measure of an individual is the depth of his convictions, the height of his ideals and the breadth of his human interests and sympathies." American womanhood must hold true. One of the most interesting personalities in the sixteenth international Congress against Alcoholism was a young German girl taking her degree of Ph. D. from the University of Koln, with her thesis on the subject, "Prohibition." The purpose of her life is to make Germany dry. Let us remember Frances Willard Wang, at her prohibition task in China, and hundreds of others like her unselfishly giving of themselves for the betterment of this world. Oh, my dear young people, lose yourself and find joy in service. We know the manufacture and sale of liquor are wrong so let us work to defeat wrong. We know prohibition is right, so let us work to make right prevail.

Her Best Memorial

Anna Adams Gordon

In unstinted measure Frances J. Barnes gave to the temperance cause the devotion of a warm heart, an alert brain, and a charming, cultured personality. The annual observance of her birthday is a richly merited tribute to this gracious woman, who, for many years, skillfully and successfully promoted the young people's work in our own land and around the world.

Through articles which have appeared in our official paper, the thrilling story of Mrs. Barnes' early work in Chicago and her unique and remarkable influence in New York City, is well known. Always she was a strong staff to Frances E. Willard, especially in the formative and difficult early years. Ready to spend and be spent in the service of the W. C. T. U. and of our young people, she was like a beloved younger sister to our great leader. Her marked spiritual power, her fine sense of humor, her platform ability and her intellectual power, were all consecrated to the advancement of total abstinence and prohibition.

She came to the world at Easter time. The rich unfolding of countless young lives into a dedicated purpose to serve the cause that lacks assistance against the wrong that needs resistance, is Frances J. Barnes' best memorial.

The Polyglot Petition and the Primaries

P lan to present the Polyglot Petition to the Christian Endeavor Societies and the Epworth Leagues and ask all their members to sign it.

O pen the conversation by naming the many nationalities represented by the signatures to the historic document.

L ead up gradually to the present situation, showing that all the civilized nations are interested in learning how to deal with the liquor traffic.

Y oke up the world-interest in prohibition with the issue before us at the primaries and the next election.

G uide the thought of the persons whose signatures you are soliciting to a consideration of what it would mean to our foreign missionaries if Christian America did not battle for the retention of prohibition.

L eave no argument unspoken to persuade them not only to sign the Polyglot Petition but to do their duty at the primaries in nominating for Congress men who will vote in support of the Volstead Law.

O vercome any objections they may offer by telling them of the benefits of prohibition.

T actfully suggest their responsibility as Christians to work whole-heartedly to promote law enforcement and to hold the national prohibition law.

500,000 Signatures to the Polyglot Petition—Everybody Sign!

April Plans

The National W. C. T. U. has designated April as Y. P. B. month, and April 14, the birthday of Frances J. Barnes, as Y. P. B. Red Letter Day. Remember our national goal—5,000 new members and 500 new branches. For the first meeting in April plan a program to which members of all young people's societies are invited, secure the best speaker possible, who will explain the purpose and present the pledge. Arrange an attractive program; distribute the pledge, and collect dues. Do not forget to push the Polyglot Petition!

Let each member secure one new member. If special emphasis is paid to pledge signing and pledge keeping, we recommend a pledge signing campaign, closing the contest with a membership banquet. Remember, only dues-paid members count.

Each branch seek to organize one new branch. Where possible we recommend that the entire month be given to an itinerary for the state secretary.

Unions holding a quarterly meeting for the young people may select programs for that meeting from the suggested outline, and for new branches we recommend that the general secretary select those best adapted to their problems.

Jennie Casseday, the Lady of the Blossoms

Not a eulogy, nor indeed a biography, but a thrilling, inspiring tale of a frail little invalid who brought the big bustling world to her bedside and persuaded it to help her in a beautiful ministry for others. Such is the story of the life of Jennie Casseday, written by her sister, Mrs. Fannie Casseday Duncan. One follows with keenest interest the annals of her care-free, sheltered girlhood, her happy young womanhood, the sad accident that shut her in from the world, the adjusting of her young life to perpetual invalidism and suffering, and the triumphant forgetting of self and pain and worry in planning and working for others. It is told of her, "Jennie kept a day book in which she wrote each night the blessings of the day as they had been experienced by her. The first page was headed with this quotation: 'Count your blessings one by one.' Under it she had written, 'I cannot. They rush upon me like waters from a gargoyle.'"

Frances Willard said of her, "She preached from her little white bed sermons more eloquent than bishops do in great cathedrals—this Queen of human flowers."

The little volume is most attractive in appearance and makes a beautiful gift book. Order from National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, price $1.00.

Former Member of New Jersey Legislature Points Out Methods of Gaining Definite Results

When, despite unfavorable weather conditions, seventy-eight guests recently presented themselves at the M. E. church in Haddonfield, New Jersey, to attend a W. C. T. U. luncheon, they successfully demonstrated that where a great cause is concerned it would take more than a little rain to dampen their ardor. A delicious repast was served, and white ribbon songs, sung between courses, enlivened the occasion. Miss Esther H. Elfreth, state president, graciously yielded her place on the program to Mrs. Van Ness, former member of the New Jersey legislature. Mrs. Van Ness pointed out that if we would accomplish definite results, we must carry our convictions to the polls, and estimated that at the last election in her state about four-fifths of the people failed to cast their ballots. The wet interests worked unceasingly and spent money lavishly to get out every possible wet vote. Two more dry votes in each precinct in Essex county would have returned Mrs. Van Ness to the legislature. Nor is it enough, she insisted, for women to vote intelligently. They must be alert to send letters and telegrams to their representatives in the state legislature and Congress whenever legislation directly affecting them is pending. Mrs. Van Ness declared that it is the political apathy of Christian people that makes possible the commercialization of the Lord's Day, the lax enforcement of prohibition, and the difficulty in enacting and enforcing laws against child labor and night work for women. In the evening Mrs. Van Ness addressed an audience in the Presbyterian church. A beautiful program, which included organ and vocal solos, the reading by Miss Elfreth of Lincoln's Political Creed, and Scripture reading by Mrs. Harry B. Levis, president of the local W. C. T. U., was carried out.

Another Call From the Jungles of Panama

Rebecca Naomi Rhodes, National Superintendent of Social Welfare

Again I have an appeal from the Panama Canal Zone, this time from Chaplain Claude S. Harkey, U. S. A., stationed at Corozal, and having general oversight of all welfare work for soldiers on the Pacific side of the Isthmus. He writes as follows:

"I have this week made request, through the superintendent of the local union, for 1,000 comfort bags. I am most grateful to your organization for this service to the men and feel that such courtesies on your part are well worth while.

"I rejoice greatly in the unparalleled success God has given the prohibition cause, and feel that the nation is under lasting obligation to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

"With many thanks, and best wishes for continued success, I am

"Yours in His service,

"Claude S. Harkey, Chaplain, U. S. Army."

A letter from Mrs. Ida M. Parsons, of Balboa, Canal Zone, to whom Chaplain Harkey applied for the bags, supplies this additional information: "There are three companies of soldiers who are soon to go into the jungle. They will be there until June, and the chaplain would be very glad to receive the bags in time to distribute them before the men depart. As a result of the drastic reduction of the force of Canal employes, our local W. C. T. U. membership has during the last year been so depleted that we have scarcely a quorum left, and it is useless to think of getting new members at present, as, owing to the prevailing feeling of uncertainty, no one is ready to consider the taking up of new work or new duties. It is, therefore, quite impossible for us to undertake the task of supplying the comfort bags, but I told Chaplain Harkey I would be glad to communicate with you regarding the matter and see if the need could be met."

We need these bags for our own home forts, too. Thousands and thousands can be used. Will not everyone who reads this, resolve to make and fill at least one bag, and send it to her state superintendent, who, when she gets a sufficient number—about twenty-five or thirty at a time—should forward them immediately to Claude S. Harkey, Chaplain U. S. Army, Corozal, Panama Canal Zone.

Chaplain Chester, from whom a letter was printed in THE UNION SIGNAL last December, is in another part of the Zone. Those who have planned to send comfort bags to him should continue to do so as he has received only a comparatively small number of the 600 he desired. However, since both chaplains have indicated their need, it might be well for the state superintendent to divide the number she receives, sending some to each point. Chaplain Chester's address is J. E. Chester, Chaplain U. S. Army, Fort Randolph, Panama Canal Zone.

I would be so glad if every local union in the whole United States would definitely plan to make one sunshine bag, one army khaki comfort bag, and one sailor's blue denim bag, sending them, when completed, to the state superintendent. Each state would then have on hand a supply to meet the calls that come to us from time to time. The comfort and sunshine bags are, perhaps, our best medium for disseminating Christian truths and principles.

STUDY BIBLE NOW!
Better Than College Course

Former President Roosevelt

William Lyon Phelps, A. M., Ph. D., professor of English language and literature, Yale University, says:

"I thoroughly believe in a university education for both men and women; but I believe a knowledge of the Bible without a college course is more valuable than a college course without the Bible.

"Every one who has a thorough knowledge of the Bible may truly be called educated; and no other learning or culture, no matter how extensive or elegant, can form a proper substitute."

And former President Roosevelt said:

"To every man who faces life with real desire to do his part in everything, I appeal for a study of the Bible. No book of any kind ever written has so affected the whole life of a people."

The Correspondence method of Bible study is the best method for securing a thorough knowledge of the Bible—better than any oral teaching can possibly be. More than 7,000 persons of 40 different occupations are now enrolled in one or more of the studying the inspired Revelation under the direction of eminent, Spirit-filled, Bible scholars. To really know the Bible is an education out of which springs the fullest and best development of one's powers in any vocation. This marvelous Book has moulded earth's loftiest characters. It meets man's deepest needs. It charts the only path to real and lasting success. Dig in it as for gold and you will secure treasure of value and extent beyond any calculation. Letters of warmest appreciation are constantly received from students and graduates. For example:

Moody Bible Institute's Correspondence Courses

"It has never been my privilege to be fascinated with Bible study as I am with this course."

"I have come to know the Bible in an entirely new light. The Old Testament is now intensely interesting."

"The benefits I have received from the Synthetic Course are beyond estimate and above price."

"I finished the Scofield Bible Course about three years ago. It has been of greater value to me than any other training I have ever had, though I spent four years in college."

A Clergyman says: "I often mention in my sermons that a Correspondence Course from the Moody Bible Institute has been of far greater value to me than all of my Bible and theological work in college."

No matter what your occupation you can study the Bible by correspondence. These courses open a new world to you—broaden your vision, develop your understanding, answer your questions, help solve your perplexities, give comfort and encouragement.

The Other Flowers

Agnes E. Volentine

"But you must join—we need you so!" protested Mrs. Moreland, W. C. T. U. president. "I'm so anxious to have our union start Child Welfare work, for which there is much need in the city, you know, and there is no one in sight to take charge of that department. With your experience in settlement work, and your ability, you are the very one for such service."

Mrs. Corley, the old friend on whom Mrs. Moreland was calling, shook her head. "I know it is good work," she agreed, "but as I said before, I simply don't have time for it."

"Of course all of us with homes to care for are busy," conceded her visitor. "Surely, however, you have a little spare time!"

"None at all in the day-time—every minute is full. If I read, or make calls, I must do it in the evening. No, I really can't take upon myself this added burden."

Mrs. Moreland at last gave up hope. "Of course you know best what you can do, Mrs. Corley," she said slowly. "I felt so sure, though, that you who know so well the dark side of child-life would do it. But, well—"

"I'm sorry; and I hope you can find some one else."

"It is no use to try now. We will have to let the work go, that's all."

Though Mrs. Moreland's tone was cordial, it so plainly showed disappointment, that her hostess stirred uneasily and when her visitor began soon afterward to draw on her gloves, she made a special effort to end the call more happily.

"Come out into the back yard and see my flowers," she urged, leading the way. "You have not been here since I've had them growing. You know I lived in the city so long that after I married and moved out here in the suburbs where I could raise posies, I've been crazy to have lots of them."

"Well, you surely have your desire now!" cried Mrs. Moreland, looking down the gay-bordered walk, with artistically arranged beds on each side.

"Yes, and I am going to put flowers all along the front walk next. You see I have a few narcissus plants started on each side of the steps, with climbing roses at the west end of the porch. And next winter I am going to have more windows put in my den, with shelves all across full of potted plants.

"It's lots of work, of course," she admitted, "and I do it all myself as we can't afford to hire help. But I'm so carried away with my flowers, I don't mind."

In her enthusiasm, Mrs. Corley had not noticed that her friend was listening with an expression that was half amused, half pained.

"Flowers are certainly lovely things to work with," she finally said; "and they set off a place beautifully. But so many—" She paused thoughtfully. "How about the other flowers?" she asked softly.

"The other flowers?"

"Yes, the poor little human flowers, that are untended, trampled and crushed!"

And with a murmured word of parting, Mrs. Moreland left her friend alone to digest the words.

* * * * *

"The other flowers!" The phrase kept sounding in Mrs. Corley's mind through the rest of that day; and even returned to disturb her night slumbers. And when, the next morning, she went out to her usually beloved task, she seemed to have lost her zest for growing things.

"I'm afraid those poor little 'other flowers' do need attention more," she told herself. There came to her the memory of wan factory children, old before their time; of homes that were not homes, dark, dirty, desolate; of tired, ignorant mothers forced to bear babies only to bury them; of moral conditions, not only in the slums but elsewhere, that carried the young to ruin as by an avalanche.

"And I am more responsible than some—I know! And I understand what should be done. But," she faltered, "can I give up—this?" looking out over the blossoming plants.

She dropped her hoe and sat down on the cool grass to think.

"We cannot do all the things in the world we would like to do," she philosophized. "Ruskin said, writing of books, that if we read this, we cannot read that; so, in everything, we must make our choice. And here is a 'conflict,' as we used to say when arranging our college courses—I must choose between the two. I need these flowers—the other flowers need me. It would be more unselfish to consider the latter. What if it is a sacrifice? Those who help any good cause, promote any noble work, usually do it at the expense of their personal pleasure. Still it is right to have beauty about us."

A few moments more of rapid thought brought her to a decision: "I will choose the 'other flowers,'" she thought, "but with a reservation. I will keep a few plants, enough to feast my eyes upon and give me what outdoor exercise I need, but never enough to crowd out this more important task."

She began to plan how she would tell one of her neighbors, who had regretted moving too late to plant flower-seeds, that she could take up about half the plants—clumps of grass, set in the vacant spaces, would soon spread. She would keep for herself the borders and a small bed on each side, with narcissi and climbing roses. That would really do nicely.

Then, after this, she would choose principally the more permanent plants rather than the annual—which would require less work; while she would have only a few potted plants in the winter.

"And Jeffrey will be glad!" she remembered, brightening at the thought what her husband would say. "He h no time to help, and is always fussi because I spend so much time flowers."

She looked out again over her love blooming plants, with the shaded la beyond, and thought how different wou be her Child Welfare work in the ci sordid, discouraging, with stifling he "But," she reminded herself, "the other flowers, untended and crushed earth—those poor little human flow are more in need."

The Enemy

Frances S. Hallowes

(The S. S. "Persia" is bound for India, having among its passengers Major Orde and Bertram Harford, who have become acquainted with a Mrs. Carlyle, her small son, Eric, and Angela O'Connor, who, in the charge of Mrs. Carlyle, is on her way to marry a Deputy Commissioner at Seraneb. Harford, who is a total abstainer, is glad to note that Angela refuses to drink, and the two become good friends. Consequently, Harford is much shocked to learn that Angela has been induced by Mrs. Carlyle to take some whisky for seasickness and has been overcome by the liquor. Through pity for her he breaks his reticence on the subject, and tells her that both his parents were victims of drink, and that he had promised his mother on her deathbed never to touch alcohol in any form. Angela admits that she has made her mother a similar promise, but does not mention any particular reason therefor. At Bombay Angela is met by her fiance, Frank Fortescue, and the wedding takes place. After a long railroad journey they arrive at Seraneb. During the course of the first dinner in the new home, Fortescue urges wine upon his wife, much to the distress of Divan Singh, a Christian native in charge of Fortescue's establishment.)

CHAPTER X.

Fortescue's duties called him away in the early morning. Punctilious in business, he was a model of an Indian official in all that pertained to his appointment. He left Angela sleeping at seven o'clock.

About eight she awakened with a headache, and with a sense of oppression. Her mind played round the experiences of last evening.

"I seem to have forgotten everything after the verandah. I suppose I went to sleep in that long chair. Perhaps it was the wine! No, I was tired with my journey, that was it! However, I won't have any more of that champagne, because I promised Mr. Harford; today I shall ask Frank to give it up."

Her heart sank at the thought, for she realized dimly that Frank was not easily persuaded.

"Choti Haziri, Mem Sahiba," said the silver-decked Ayah in her ear.

"Yes, where is the Sahib?"

"Gone long time ago."

"Oh, how lazy I am; I must hurry up, there is so much to do."

She rose hastily, and donned a white linen dress and panama hat.

"I shall go into the garden, Ayah. Perhaps the fresh air will do my head good."

"Sun very hot, Mem Sahiba."

"Ah, it is India! Give me a sunshade."

She was soon out strolling around the compound, peeping into servants' houses, picking flowers, full of interest in all the new sights and sounds of Indian life, yet all the while aware of an undercurrent of thought accusing and excusing for the last night's yielding to her husband's wishes.

"Mother will soon be here, and she will make the matter easy for me."

Thus she comforted herself, and tried to push her good angel aside. Ah, good angels, how frequently your word in reason is spurned, your contention with evil neutralized by our weakness and disobedience! Your good counsels, tender, holy memories, were lightly spurned by the young wife that day!

A high dog-cart drove up, and Fortescue alighted. He saw Angela, and called out hastily, "Angela, come here."

She ran to him, and he kissed and clasped her.

"I have to be off by the twelve train; a telegram for me has just arrived."

"Oh, Frank, going away?"

"Yes, dear, but for one night only. Cheer up, I shall soon be back."

"How far away do you go?"

"To Rupazrim, only forty miles off."

"Why, that is where Mr. Harford is; do call on him, Frank.

"Harford! who is he?"

"Don't you remember I introduced him to you on the 'Persia'?"

"Oh, yes, that chap? I remember now."

"Such a nice fellow and so good-looking," said Angela.

Fortescue looked at her narrowly, then hurrying off he gave orders for his bag to be packed.

"Just forty minutes before I go, little woman; let us have breakfast."

He told her many things during the meal about the people in the station.

"You will have a crowd of visitors today, so be prepared."

"Oh, Frank, with you away! I am so shy of strangers."

"Nonsense, child, you must get used to seeing fresh faces in India. This being a show city it is a great place for globe-trotters."

He kissed her and jumped into his cart.

"Au revoir, my Angela!" he cried.

She kissed her hand to him, and then called out, "Don't forget Mr. Harford."

Then to herself, "There now I have not said what I intended to Frank." While she was ruminating on this thought, a carriage drove up.

"Here are the visitors, and I am in this frock; never mind, I can't help it."

Angela looked very young and girlish standing in her beautiful drawing-room. Visitors came rapidly, soon the room seemed full of people; she felt confused by so many, but could do no more than talk to one lady at a time. She was relieved to see that they knew each other, and chatted comfortably together. As for their names she was much too nervous to read the cards handed to her.

"Are you fond of dancing?" "Do you sing?" "Do you act?" "Do you play bridge?" were the questions most frequently asked her.

Angela soon looked hot and excited, and felt relieved as the last carriage swept round the drive.

"How am I to know them all again?" and "I shall have to return these calls."

The thought of herself returning these civilities appalled her.

"I must go out now and forget it all," and she ordered her carriage and drove out.

Angela was filled with curiosity to see the "weird multitudinous East." So she told the coachman to drive to the native city. Her horses whirled her through what seemed to her to be lanes and alleys, so narrow are Indian streets. The stream of slender, brown people in their bright-hued clothing, tempered by dust-color, flew from under her horses' heels salaaming to the Burri Mem Sahiba, except a few who scowled and grumbled under their breath; but on to the wide dusty road she was carried, where the same kind of stream, though thinner, surged along in the dust.

Animals seemed as numerous as men. Camels stalked along with their haughty noses in the air, donkeys with packs on their backs, the poor, thin, bony creatures trotting despondently along in companies. Great grey, noble-looking bullocks with humps, drew huge unwieldy carts. Monkeys flew along the avenues of stunted trees, gibbering at the crowd below. All the sights delighted Angela.

"I have so often read of it, it is delightful to see it all," she said to herself.

She drove home from the sight of that crowded Indian city to her spacious bungalow, tired, and feeling somewhat solitary. In a vague kind of way, she promised herself to lead a useful life, to learn Hindustani, and make her servants into Christians, perhaps even go outside and help the missionaries.

Angela had lived a very secluded life hitherto. Her mother had purposely watched over every book she had read, every person she had known. And now in her new liberty of married woman she was but an eager child drinking in impressions at every pore.

"When Mother comes!" was a sentence always on her lips or in her mind. Her husband took still the second place. She was sincerely anxious to "be a good wife," as she phrased it, and she meant to put her heart into the home duties which her mother told her came first in a woman's life.

Angela had in her the foundation of a worthy character; she was a sweet minded woman, ready to respond to the best. A woman who might be a great success as wife and mother, or a great failure.

Circumstances are potent with all, but there are too many who cannot govern themselves and are the sport of every wind that blows. The ivy kind of woman may have a good time, if she secures a stalwart oak; but such oaks are not very plentiful.

Trio Team Testimony and Other Good Words For the Union Signal

Connecticut's treasurer, in telling how to organize a Trio Team, says: "Each captain (president, secretary and treasurer) should have THE UNION SIGNAL as her greatest aid. If she is not a subscriber, let the union furnish it to these three captains and send for it at once."

New Hampshire's state president says: "I am more and more convinced that without THE UNION SIGNAL and our state paper we are ill-prepared for our work and our unions are weak or strong in just the proportion that these papers are read. Surely every officer of our local unions should take THE UNION SIGNAL.'"

Mrs. Ella A. Gleason, president of the Massachusetts W. C. T. U., in the state paper, delivers the following fine little homily on the value of the SIGNAL to the workers:

"We still have with us the joke against prohibition. In one column in a daily paper, I read seven so-called jokes, all calculated to influence the reader against enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment. One or two were quite subtle and I thought of the effect upon the young people who would read them. With a feeling of depression, I put by the paper. Shortly afterwards I took up my UNION SIGNAL and, to my joy, found an answer to every one of these jokes. In that one issue of our national organ there were facts enough to convert any half-hearted adherent of our cause.

"Why, oh why, do we not have THE UNION SIGNAL in more homes of white-ribboners We have to meet the falsehoods and fallacies of the anti-prohibitionists. Let us be prepared to answer them effectively!

"A member of our organization said to me, 'I heard a man say, "What a curse prohibition has been to the country. See the empty distilleries, breweries and saloons; thousands of dollars' worth of property lying idle and going to decay." O, I wish I could have answered him.' 'Why, my dear woman,' I replied, 'his statement is false; you can read the truth of this whole matter in THE UNION SIGNAL.' Turning away she said, 'But I do not take THE UNION SIGNAL.' If we are to win the hard battle before us, we must give our people the truth; the truth will free us from the weight of all these jokes and sneers and falsehoods."

Alabama's president, in the last state paper, asks the following pertinent questions: "Was March First, UNION SIGNAL Day, celebrated in your union? Did you send a list of subscriptions to THE UNION SIGNAL? Will you present the matter to your union, calling for subscriptions at every meeting? Appoint someone whose duty it shall be to attend to this work. Include in your budget for the year the price of a subscription to THE UNION SIGNAL for each of three of your officers. The Vermont state paper reports, "'We are urging every local union to take THE UNION SIGNAL for its president, secretary and treasurer as a means of information and inspiration, and to help mobilize the women to oppose the thirty associations opposed to prohibition."

Montana's state corresponding secretary gives as its slogan: "A UNION SIGNAL for each member of the Trio Team and each Member Win Three."

Mrs. Hemminway, the president of the Woman's Club, has been of great assistance and the W. C. T. U. has invited the club to take charge of the night school for adults to be held in the same building.

The faithfulness and devotion of these earnest women who have so perseveringly carried on the work, and the spirit of interest and co-operation manifested by the various churches and organizations cannot be too highly commended. What Carlsbad has done, other towns can do if there are the faithful few.

AMERICANIZATION OF ALIENS THROUGH EDUCATION—OVERCROWDED DOCKETS TO BE RELIEVED BY ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGES—ALLIED DEBT REFUNDING COMMISSION CONFIRMED—REDUCTION IN NAVY BELOW 86,000 OPPOSED BY SECRETARY HUGHES AND PRESIDENT HARDING—PERMANENT TARIFF BILL BEFORE THE SENATE—VACANCIES IN HOUSE CAUSED BY DEATHS

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

Americanization of Aliens Through Education

Hearings have been held this week on the Johnson Bill—H. R. 10860—to provide a new rule of naturalization to include separate naturalization for married women and to amend and codify the citizenship laws, with which is coupled a plan for the annual registration of aliens in the United States.

Secretary of Labor Davis, who heartily advocates the registration plan, refers to it as one to "save the alien from himself." It is not watching the alien, he declares, but helping him.

The country now has many welfare organizations, composed of public spirited citizens, who give their time and means toward the Americanization of the foreign-born new-comer. The proposed legislation will co-ordinate this worthy effort, enlarge it, give it a national scope and place it under the logical supervision—that of the government itself. In the plan it is proposed to utilize the public schools in the evenings or in "over time" to give all aliens simple teaching in language, the history of the country, and the nature and use of American institutions. Motion picture machines would be drawn upon for instruction in the geography of the country and its variety of industries. We are told that the foreign language newspapers have all signified their willingness to help along this method of education by publishing in parallel columns instruction in the foreign tongue and in English.

To cover the cost of instructive work aimed at the making of citizens, it is proposed that the registering alien should pay a nominal fee precisely as citizens pay a poll tax.

The Secretary of Labor was himself an immigrant, as was his father before him, and, knowing the immigrant's turn of mind, Mr. Davis is convinced that the alien, far from resenting this system as an interference, will welcome it as an effort to help him.

It is estimated that there are now from 5,000 to 30,000 aliens in this country under the shadow of deportation. Americanization through education would have made impossible these undesirable aliens in our midst today.

The W. C. T. U. has endorsed the principle of registration, as found in H. R. 10860. Write your House members of your interest in this proposed legislation.

Overcrowded Dockets to be Relieved by Additional District Judges

On April 7 the Senate, by a vote of 44 to 21, passed a bill providing for twenty-three additional Federal judges. The committee reported in favor of nineteen, but amendments were agreed to providing for an extra judge each for New Jersey, Florida, New Mexico, and Missouri.

Under the bill, as it goes to conference of the two Houses, the number of judges in district courts is allotted as follows: Massachusetts two, New York three, Pennsylvania two, Texas, Michigan, Ohio, Illinois, Minnesota, Oklahoma, Georgia, Montana, Arizona, New Mexico, New Jersey, Florida, one each, and California and Missouri two each.

An amendment, requiring all Federal judges to devote their entire time to their judicial duties and prohibiting them from "engaging in any other employment" for compensation, was adopted. If the House conferees agree to the four additional judgeships created by the Senate, the bill will go to the President.

Allied Debt Refunding Commission Confirmed

The Allied Debt Refunding Commission was formally completed after several hours' discussion, when the nominations of Senator Smoot of Utah and Representative Burton of Ohio, by a vote of 47 to 25, were confirmed by the Senate.

Other members of the Commission are Secretary of State Hughes, Secretary of Treasury Mellon, and Secretary of Commerce Hoover.

Reduction in Navy Below 86,000 Opposed by Secretary Hughes and President Harding

Early in the week Secretary of State Hughes, in a letter to Representative Rogers of Massachusetts, set forth his views that the enlisted personnel provided for in the Navy Bill would reduce the American Navy below the 5-5-3 ratio fixed by the Armament Conference and suggested that such a reduction would prove "most injurious" to the nation's interests.

Yesterday, in a letter to Representative Longworth of Ohio, President Harding opposed a "reduction to the point where the limitation of enlisted men and apprentices is below 86,000." "Ultimately," the President said, "perhaps the lower figures proposed may be reached and I hope it may be possible, through later international concert, but the trend toward peace and security ought to be more thoroughly established before going beyond the limitation to which we were gladly committed at the international conference."

Permanent Tariff Bill Before the Senate

Chairman McCumber of the Finance Committee this week reported to the Senate the Permanent Tariff Bill, and gave notice that he would call it up April 20. Conservative leaders expressed the belief that sixty days would be required to pass it.

Treasury experts have estimated roughly that the bill will raise from $200,000,000 to $350,000,000 of revenue annually. The measure that passed the House was estimated to raise $300,000,000. The Underwood law yielded between $200,000,000 and $300,000,000.

The bill was rewritten by the Senate Finance Committee with foreign valuation the underlying principle. The House bill as passed provided for American valuation.

In the old days, when to be a Republican meant being a protectionist and Democrat a free trader, the country could generally depend on having reported revenue bill on strict party lines very soon after its chosen servants had assembled.

The situation on Capitol Hill, as relates to the Tariff Bill, emphasizes the fact that the tariff has lost much of its political party significance and is now a matter of economics.

Vacancies in House Caused by Death

Two vacancies have occurred in the House of Representatives in the past three weeks by death. Representative Lucian Parrish of Texas lost his life in an automobile accident and Representative Samuel Brinson of North Carolina died at his home this week. Both were highly respected men.

Anti-Alcohol Movement in Austria

"An energetic campaign against alcohol has been organized in Austria both by the union of total abstainers and by medical-political circles, to which the government has had to give its consent volens volens," we are told by The American Medical Association Journal of April .

"The chief cause for the sudden ght is to be found in the alarming increase of national expenditure for alcoolic drinks. A sum equaling the total xpenditure of this country for administration has been spent for wine and beer lone. It is characteristic that it is the vorking classes chiefly who are responible for this squandering of more or less ard earned income.

"It is indeed a most serious blunder nd a crime on the part of their olliticians that the working classes have ot been led to use their improved nancial position for the attainment of higher standard of life, in the shape of ducation and moral qualities, but have een allowed to drink. And as the maority of these liquids come from abroad, he money is altogether lost to the country. By co-operation of the organizations nterested, the following lines are to be ollowed, until the country can be made ompletely dry; increase of the duties n imported alcohol to such an extent hat the majority of the people cannot fford to buy, gradual reduction in the umber of licenses of public houses and vine and beer stalls, restriction of the roduction of gin, whisky and liquor in he country, and transformation of vineards into plough land.

"The second line of attack aims at the nstruction of adolescents and youths by neans of anti-alcohol lectures and exhibitions, and at influencing schoolchildren, as well as promoting these tendencies by giving premiums in factories, in agricultural circles and among women. Medical men will be encouraged to inform the population of the dangers to their offspring produced by alcohol. A sum of 50,000,000 kronen has been granted by the government for this purpose. Besides, the political parties have pledged themselves to exert an active and effective pressure on their followers along the same lines. The social-democratic party especially is quite alive to the danger arising out of present conditions."

Alcoholism a Subject For Consideration in European Universities

Weekly meetings to study the problem of alcoholism are held at Queens University, Belfast, Ireland, according to reports received by the Intercollegiate Prohibition Association. Similar groups meet at the University of Basel, Switzerland, the University of Brussels, Belgium, the University of Tubingen, Germany, and at universities in several other European countries.

Tuberculosis in Alcoholics Fatal

The report of the central committee for the instruction and institutional care of tubercuious patients and cancer eases in Berlin calls special attention to one feature of the work of 1919, the high death-rate of the alcoholic patients. The body enervated by alcoholism, the report explains, is unable, because of under nourishment, to resist any kind of disease attack and easily succumbs to it.

Added to this, the influence of alcoholism on the financial circumstances of addicts becomes so unfavorable that they are unable to provide themselves with the expensive remedies and care neeessary for their recovery. Tuberculosis appears frequently as the fatal disease of our alcoholics, even among those who abandon their alcohol, when it is, alas, too late.

French Medical Men Condemn Alcohol as a Medicine

(Special correspondence from Switzerland to the Board of Temperance, Prohibition and Public Morals of the Methodist Episcopal Church.)

The French medical men's abstinence society, in its last assembly, passed the following resolution:

"French medical abstainers, considering the special responsibility of the medical faculty as regards alcoholism, earnestly invite the medical men of all countries:

To realize this responsibilty;

To respect on all occasions, and especially in their prescriptions, the habits and convictions of abstainers just as much as the integrity of individuals not yet affected by alcohol;

To avoid in their medical and alimentary preseriptions all preparations and beverages containing alcohol, since it has been proved that the medical use of distilled or fermented liquors is in no ease formally indicated, and that they ean always be advantageously replaced by other medical substanees;

To give, on the one hand, thanks to observations made during their hospital practice or among their patients; on the other hand, thanks to methodical and impartial experiments upon the effects of a teetotal regime both upon sick people and those in good health, their collaboration to a disinterested inquiry into the therapeutic value of alcohol and to the efforts made in all circles to combat the alcoholic scourge."

Young Germans Against Alcoholism

Press dispatehes tell of a German youths' movement (Deutschen Jugendmeinschaften) developing among university students of Austria and Germany, which seems to be a general revolt against ancient authorities, traditions and customs. Among the ideas and habits attacked are militarism, monarchy, class distinction and alcoholism. The movement is idealistic-patriotic for the development of a better self and the aid of the nation in the day of trial. It takes different forms in different localities, but the general spirit seems the same.

WONDERFUL ADVANCE REPORTED AT INDIA W. C. T. U. CONVENTION

Helen I. Root

The sixteenth national convention of the India W. C. T. U. was held in Madras, January 26-31. In spite of keen disappointment that Miss Anna Gordon's many responsibilities elsewhere kept her from coming, as had been hoped, the meeting from start to finish was full of interest and enthusiasm. As limited by the constitution, the convention can never be larger in numbers but the immense distances traveled make an attendance of fifty very impressive.

There are now eight fully organized divisions of W. C. T. U. work in the India Empire—Assam, Bengal, Bombay, Central Provinces, Madras, Punjab, Rajputana and United Provinces, two of these, Assam and Rajputana, having been organized since the last convention by our World's W. C. T. U. organizer, Miss Mary Campbell. Each division was well represented by some of its general officers and delegates, and all but one were also represented on the gold-starred map prepared at Miss Campbell's suggestion to indicate every place where the W. C. T. U., the Y. P. B., the L. T. L., and the Blue Ribbon Army are found

Very touching and beautiful tributes were paid to the Countess of Carlisle, Lady Henry Somerset, Mrs. Donald Sunder of Bengal and Mrs. S. W. Stephens of Bombay. Mr. Donald Sunder, in loving memory of his wife, presented to the national union a most beautiful W. C. T. U. banner, and a smaller one to the Bengal division.

Sane, Courageous, and Witty Addresses

Of striking interest was the convention address of the national president, Mrs. F. B. Price, a very able resume of the temperanee situation in India, and a veritable call to arms for every white ribboner. Scarcely less valuable and inspiring was the address of Rao Bahadur O. Kandaswamy Chetty, lecturer in English in the Madras Christian College. This dealt mainly with the political aspect of the temperance question in India and was both sane and courageous, as well as very witty. Both these addresses were ordered printed, to be used widely as propaganda.

This was distinctly a forward looking convention, not least in the large proportion of fine devoted young women present. A school of methods was held each afternoon (attended by practically the whole convention) in which, under the general topics, "Organization," "Education," "Evangelism" and "Publicity," all the eighteen departments of work carried on by the India W. C. T. U. were presented and definite instructions given as to how to work each one. These sessions were very informal, with full liberty for the asking of questions, and proved a very informing and practical feature of a rather remarkable convention.

Inspiring Reports of Progress

Inspiring reports of progress were heard on every hand. The Literature department, in charge of Miss Joan Davis, reported sales more than doubled, and was especially gratified to present Miss Campbell's "Power House of Pathankot" reprinted in English and now printed in Persian Urdu. Also an Outline of Temperance Instruction for schools prepared by one of our members, Miss Lawton of Jhansi, working in connection with the temperanee committee of her own mission. With this outline are furnished all the books and illustrative material required for the teacher. Thus a long felt need is admirably met. The Juvenile department has prepared a Book of Plans designed to help all leaders of children's Temperanee Bands.

A proposition came from the Christian Literature Society to unite their India Temperance News with our India Temperance Record and White Ribbon. This plan, on recommendation of the Executive Committee and after full consideration by the convention, was adopted, Mrs. W. L. Ferguson of Madras to be acting editor and the C. L. S. agreeing

IN THE TROPICS

Christine I. Tinling

(The first account of Miss Tinling's trip to the Philippines was lost on its way to America. Learning of its non-receipt, Miss Tinling rewrote the article, and our readers will peruse it with a keen enjoyment in no sense diminished by the length of time which has elapsed since the events narrated took place. —Editor.)

We are in the Philippines. Our friends will doubtless wonder what we are doing here, and why we have left our vast field to explore another. As the lunar calendar is used in China, the New Year is a movable feast and this time it occurs in February. The first five days are entirely given over to festive celebrations. All the stores are closed and it is difficult to hire anybody to do the least bit of unnecessary work. There is a general exchange of visits; people pay their respects to all their friends at this season, and before it closes every call must be returned or a serious offence will have been committed. There is an almost complete stoppage of the usual activities. Even the hospitals in some cases are closed, except for a ward or two, including the patients who are seriously ill. All the others are called for by their friends and ready or unready they go home for New Year. The first day is everybody's birthday and is the only one which most people know. The Chinese reckon age, not from the date of birth, but from their first New Year's Day. The schools close for about one month so those of us who are in educational work must perforce cease operations during that time.

Miss Wang and I have completed our long tour in the Yang-tse Valley and our next engagement is in the south. We go to Hongkong, and thence to Canton, Amoy and Foochow. On account of the general dislocation of affairs we were asked not to attempt to begin before the end of the month. The trip from Shanghai to Canton must be made by boat as there are no railroads. Some of the steamers go round by the Philippines and allow a stop-over. As no festival is in progress in these islands, we arranged to spend almost two weeks here and timed the voyage so as to reach Hongkong when schools will again be open and ready to receive us.

Chessboard Country and Nipa Homesteads

As I write, the train is running from San Fernando back to Manila. We are passing through flat country, divided up into small patches almost as regular as a chess-board. Each has round it a miniature dyke about ten inches high. For irrigation a little break is made in this and the rice-field is quickly flooded from the ditch. Here and there we see men plowing with the carabao, the ever-present beast of burden, ugly and loutish with great horns spreading beyond the width of the broad body. But looks are not everything and the carabao is an invaluable member of society.

Oddly enough there seems to be a prevailing fashion in these flats, and nether garments of bright scarlet distinguish the spots where laborers are bending over their work. Women too are busy in the fields, and some of them are planting rice with a pointed implement made from the bamboo. The little nipa houses are as neat and trim as can be. They are constructed of leaves from the nipa palm, strung on to poles of this same bamboo. They stand on piles, raised about four feet from the ground. There is room underneath for a man to sit and work in the welcome shade and for little children to play and chickens and pigs to run about.

Now we are passing by fields of sugar-cane and the eye is refreshed by the delicate green of its long leaves. Here and there is a fire-tree, a mass of brilliant color, and there are wild peach-blossoms of exquisite pink, reminding one of the scenes of home. Most abundant of all are the bananas with their immense leaves and their one big cluster of fruit. Each little palm-leaf house has an appropriate number of these, which must go far towards filling the hungry mouths. Beyond the neatly constructed nests, and beyond the patchwork of rice-fields, is an almost unbroken line of the fair and feathery bamboo. No wonder that in Oriental art it has so prominent a place, for its presence adds grace and beauty to any picture.

Manila Scenes and People

Here and there among the groves there stands out a mango, conspicuous for the sturdiness and symmetry of its build as well as for the dark green of its leaves. And behind all, a purple cone against the sky, the extinct volcano of Arayat towers aloft in solitary grandeur.

And now the scene has changed and we are back in Manila, which is an elegant modern city. Its renown for paper, cigars and hemp hardly requires mention. It is not to be expected that anti-tobacco teaching will be specially popular in a country where the much-loved weed is one of the leading crops, but the truth needs to be told here as everywhere and we are glad to report a courteous reception on all hands. The Filipinos are essentially gracious and in the Islands as in other Oriental countries Westerners may learn many lessons in politeness.

Much might be said about the beauty of the now historic bay and about the buildings of Old Spain and up-to-date America. But more interesting to us than anything else in the capital are the people themselves, and that especially on account of the abundance of young life. Manila streets and parks are gay with boys and girls, students in the various Government institutions. There are about twenty thousand of them, while the entire population roughly numbers a quarter of a million. The Y. M. C. A. is doing fine work and has some twelve hundred members on its roll. It carries on its own high school, both day and night, and this institution is recognized by the Government. There are three distinct plants on one site. One is used by the Filipino city Y., and another by the student Y. The third is for Americans and Europeans, the boys out from home, some of them doubtless sons of our white ribboners. Here they find healthy recreation, educational opportunities and spiritual uplift. We were glad to get our temperance message before many young men through this splendid Y. M. C. A.

Educational Opportunities

Manila boasts an up-to-date Normal school with about six hundred students. The principal is in hearty sympathy with temperance reform and the dean of the girls' dormitory is earnestly solicitous for the welfare of those in her charge. So I received a warm welcome in this institution and was privileged to address the weekly assembly, take three physiology classes and to talk twice beside to the girls in the dormitory. Miss Wang and I spoke also in some of the other dormitories. There are not many mission schools in the Philippine Islands because the American government has made thorough provision for education But the missionaries get into touch with students by having these dormitories both for girls and boys. They are carried on as happy Christian homes and are much appreciated.

Several times my first engagement was for six o'clock in the morning, for in the tropics one must be up with the sun and get some work done before the worst of the heat comes on. Altogether in thirteen days I have given thirty-four talks of various kinds. Miss Frances Wang has scored a great success and made many friends. She has been much in demand among the missionaries, the Filipinos and the Chinese, of whom there are a considerable number in Manila.

There is a promising W. C. T. U. in the capital city, the president of which is Miss Abiertas, a young Filipino lawyer She is very strong in her convictions and fearless in the expression of them. The little union also counts among its members several others who are engaged in professional work. Filipino women have a reputation for exceptional business ability, and it is said that no Filipino man makes any important business decision without first consulting his wife.

(Since this article was written, word has been received of the sudden passing of Miss Abiertas.—Editor.)

Stereomotorgraph Arrives in Manila

Our W. C. T. U. work in the Islands is in charge of Mrs. Clyda Bundy, an American missionary who was formerly an active white ribboner in Seattle. It was to her hospitable home that we went when we first landed, and there I stayed all the time we were in Manila while Miss Wang was claimed by Chinese friends. During my visit an event occurred which was of no small interest to those on the spot, and the thought of which ought to give pleasure to white ribboners at home. An express wagon arrived bringing a large packing-case which contained one of the stereomotographs furnished to the soldiers during the war. One is specially glad to know that Manila has been favored with one of these machines, for it is a center where there are unusual opportunities for educational work. The students alone offer a large field of labor and the pictures will be a constant source of interest to them and others, displayed as they will be at a central point in the city.

The few faithful workers over here need all the help and encouragement that friends at home can give. The situation is difficult and disappointing. As is well-known, prohibition does not apply in the Philippines. By some political hook or crook the Islands are allowed exceptional treatment and liquor is sold under the American flag though America has outlawed it forever. "Consistency thou art a jewel," and a jewel in this instance conspicuous by its absence. The liquor traffic has grown of late years even more rapidly than it grew in the United States in the days of its power. In fifteen years the amount consumed increased 250 per cent and the places licensed for sale multiplied nearly 350 per cent.

Much of the liquor used is of native origin and the harm it has done in the islands is a matter of history. The Philippine Journal of Science gives particulars regarding the influence of alcohol more than three hundred years ago, as follows: "From the earliest times, the natives of the Philippine Islands have been, to a certain extent, addicted to the use of intoxicating beverages, and throughout the Spanish history of the Archipelago, references to its baneful influences are continually to be found. Antonia Pigafetta first records that at the Island of Mazava, the second of the Philippine group sighted by the Europeans, at which Magalhaes anchored on March 28, 1521, the native kings got so drunk that they could not harvest their rice crop. In 1565 the Governor recognized the evil effects of the native beverages. He ordered that wine should not be bought or sold within the camp.

"In a document which purports to be a letter from Mirandaola to the king, dated June 8, 1574, it is stated that the natives 'have wines of many kinds, brandy, made from palm-wine (which is obtained from the coconut palm and from the wild nipa palm), pitarrillos, which are the wines made from rice, millet and borona, and other wines made from sugar-cane.'

"Bianco in 1837 wrote, 'If, after the fermentation of the tuba, the liquor is distilled over, an alcohol, more or less passable, is obtained. After a time it causes terrible harm to them (the natives), producing premature old age, loss of appetite, sleeplessness, dropsy, boils, loss of intellectual faculty, and finally insanity results. These shameful sicknesses are also caused by European wine although more slowly.'"

Enforcement of Eighteenth Amendment Needed in the Philippines

Coming down to the present day we find a leading Filipino, the Attorney-General of the Islands, making this statement: "Two-thirds of the fiscals of the Archipelago declare that local drinks, such as tuba, coconut and nipa wines and basi are mainly responsible for the crimes against persons, chiefly those of assault and battery and homicide." The Internal Revenue agent of Nueva Caceres states: "My personal observation leads me to believe that 'tuba fiends' are, next to morphine fiends, the most degenerate specimens of humanity I have ever met." Surely it is an untold pity that America should not save the Filipinos from an age-long curse, when nothing is needed to secure this benefit, save the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment.

A missionary living in a section of country where sugar-cane is a leading crop told me that she found it hard to procure any sugar since it was not made there. It appears that the cane is used in the manufacture of the intoxicant known as basi, which is sold for the equivalent of twenty-five cents a gallon. One glass of this is sufficient to produce intoxication in persons not accustomed to it. One must guard against hasty generalization in respect to conditions in the Philippine Islands. While the above is true in some provinces, in others the cane is cultivated for the manufacture of sugar. Again, in some parts there is excessive drinking of distilled liquors; in some the chief trouble is with fermented drinks, while there are yet other places where drunkenness is rarely seen.

A visit to an open market is interesting and instructive in more ways than one.

Filipino Neighbors

Alongside of the many luxurious fruits and luscious vegetables in which the tropics abound, one sees signs of the various harmful concoctions that tempt the palate. On the one hand there are the papaya, the pomelo, and the pomegranate, the odd little chico that tastes like brown sugar, the armor-plated breadfruit, the marble-sized lemons and the huge coconuts. Close beside them is the pan or bucket of coconut wine, made from the sap, looking like milk and water and smelling very decidedly of alcohol.

The cigaret is much in evidence in the market as indeed everywhere else. Women of the lower class smoke a great deal, and many little children have acquired the habit. The costume of Filipino women is quite unique and somewhat artistic in effect. They wear a long skirt with an elaborate train, the latter being commonly pinned up on the left hip during the hours of activity. The waist consists of a sort of mosquito netting, stiffly starched and often beautifully embroidered. The sleeves, which reach to the elbow, are very wide, reminding one of our own fashion of some twenty years ago. The working woman, like the rest, sports mosquito netting and a train, and often bears a heavy basket on her head and perhaps a second on top of that. A cigaret between her lips will complete the picture.

Smoking and Chewing Popular

We went one afternoon to the cemetery, noted for its beautiful trees and its remains of Spanish architecture. Several funerals were in progress and as the mourners bore on their shoulders the little highly-decorated hearses, women were to be seen following their dead with a cigar or a cigaret in the mouth. One missionary told me he had stayed in a home where there were several little children and he saw twins four years old and others slightly older, all smoking huge cigars before breakfast. Another spoke of some remote place in the interior where a cigar about a foot long and fat in proportion might sometimes be seen dangling from the ceiling so as to allow the members of the family to take a puff as each felt inclined.

Another thing that attracts one's attention both in the market and on the road is the betel nut. The tall and graceful betel palm is very common, and the fruit, about the size of a lemon, grows in a large yellow bunch at the top. The nut is its hard seed. The market women sell these nuts along with leaves of the betel vine in which to wrap them. The vine is a plant which somewhat resembles the one which yields black pepper. These leaves are to be seen, arranged in geometrical order, in flat baskets. A bit of nut is wrapped in a leaf which has first been daubed with shell lime and the little package is thus held in the mouth. The result is a copious flow of saliva, which is red, and dyes mouth, lips and gums the same color. The teeth become black. Ugly as it is, there are not wanting apologists for the habit. They maintain that the increased flow of saliva improves digestion, just as some at home argue that alcohol is an aid in this direction. Doubtless both cause for a time an increased secretion by irritating the glands. But it stands to reason that glands which overdo for a while under such provocation will later do less than their normal amount of work.

When I inveighed against the betel nut in a meeting one day, our well-known American habit of chewing gum was cast up to me. We cannot deny that it is very dirty and that the horrid little chunks which may be seen sticking to chairs and tables, and sometimes even to church pews are repulsive in the extreme. Truth is not always palatable but one has to accept it. After all, why should educated people who chew gum look down on uneducated people who chew betel?

"Once More unto the Breach"

There are other occasions, however, when we have a right indignantly to resent the imputation made in regard to our country. The following is a case in point. At a fiesta, or festival, not long ago, held in Manila, there was a grand parade with many ornamental floats. One of them was that of the San Miguel brewery and it bore aloft a huge globe. Encircling it, as we sometimes encircle it with a white ribbon, was the badge of the brewery. Above all was the American eagle, large as life and covered with real feathers. The parade passed through street after street announcing to all and sundry that the brewery was under the protection of the American government. And this was after the United States had written prohibition into its Constitution and declared to the world at large that the liquor traffic was banished forever! As the procession moved on, it had to pass under a bridge. The bird came into collision with the stone-work and crashed to earth. Certain it is that the American eagle cannot preside over the brewery and maintain its dignity before the world. Will citizens who are loyal to the Constitution see to it that this insolent boast is made impossible of repetition, and that in the Philippines, as everywhere else under the Stars and Stripes, prohibition shall be recognized as the law of the land?

There are splendid men and women here who have fought hard for prohibition. It is not fair that after all their toil they should be denied the fruits of victory. They had every right to expect that these Islands would share alike with Maine and California in all the benefits of the Eighteenth Amendment. Their boys and girls need protection as much as those in the United States. "Once more unto the breach, dear friends, once more," and make prohibition a fact in the Philippines.

TESTIMONY FROM MUNICIPAL CHIEFS OF EASTERN AND WESTERN CITIES GIVES PROHIBITION GOOD RATING

Houston's Mayor Has Good Word For Dry Law

March 6, 1922.

Prohibition undoubtedly has been a great benefit to the city of Houston.

It has reduced drunkenness and the class of offenses that accompany that evil. It has reduced crime generally.

It has resulted in less juvenile delinquency and has promoted more harmonious domestic relations.

The unemployment situation has not presented as serious a problem as it would have done with the open saloon, and agencies that have in charge the amelioration of distress among the poor have noted a great difference in the number and class of people calling for help.

Experience and observation, as well as reports from the larger industries of this community, show that prohibition is promoting greater efficiency and closer attention to business, on the part of employes.

I am not in position to make a report as to whether prohibition has increased savings deposits in the various banks, as I have not the data on which to base such statement.

The general effect of prohibition on the health, happiness and prosperity of this community undoubtedly has been very beneficial.

OSCAR F. HOLCOMBE,
Mayor of Houston, Texas.

Prohibition Agrees With Springfield, Massachusetts, Says Mayor Leonard

There is what some one has called a "blessed unanimity" about the answers received from the mayors regarding prohibition. To most of the questions asked the reply is a succinct "Yes". The mayor of Springfield, Massachusetts, in filling out the questionnaire, gave his testimony that prohibition of the liquor traffic has been of benefit to his city; that it has reduced drunkenness and other offenses due to it; that it has been of advantage in promoting efficiency in the big industries; that it has prompted thrift, and that in his opinion the effect of the dry law on the general welfare of the community is "GOOD".

Mayor of Spokane, Washington, Testifies to Benefits of Prohibition

In reply to a letter addressed to Hon. C. A. Fleming, mayor of Spokane, Washington, asking what in his opinion has been the effect of prohibition on the health, bappiness and prosperity of his community, he answers with an emphatic "Beneficial." As to whether it has reduced drunkenness and the offenses that accompany that evil, he replies, "In some quarters, yes. In others, increased inability to secure liquor has reduced drunkenness."

As to its effect upon unemployment, he replies, "Impossible to answer, so many other factors entered into the situation," and the effect on efficiency, "Industries themselves prevented a test as they have not been operating constantly."

Prohibition a Boon to Hartford, Connecticut

"It is my personal opinion," writes the Hon. Newton C. Brainard, mayor of Hartford, Connecticut, "tbat prohibition has already been a boon to the community, as well as to the nation, and I feel that the results will be more and more noticeable witb a return of business prosperity."

"Very Good" Says Grand Rapids Mayor of Prohibition

Very definite and satisfactory were the replies received from Mayor McNabb of Grand Rapids, Michigan, to the question concerning the effect of prohibition on his city. He says "Yes" to the query, "Has prohibition of the liquor traffic been of benefit to your city?" He gives a strong affirmative to the interrogation, "Has it reduced drunkenness and the offenses that accompany that evil? Has it reduced crime?" "VERY GOOD results" is his answer to "Has it had any effects on juvenile delinquency?" "On domestic relations?" He gives it as his belief that prohibition has "VERY MATERIALLY," to use his words, decreased the number of families and people who need the help of charity organizations. He thinks the dry law has been of advantage, "VERY MUCH SO" in promoting greater efficiency and more steady work in big industries. He says prohibition has promoted thrift, as indicated by increased savings in the banks. And to the last question, "What in your opinion has been the effect of prohibition on the health, happiness and prosperity of your community?" he registers a hearty "VERY GOOD."

Imagining a Vain Thing!

From Chicago Evening Post, April 7, 1922.

The foes of prohibition held a rally in Carnegie Hall, New York, last night and resolved "to work patiently, lawfully and patriotically" until the Volstead law is repealed and the Eighteenth Amendment stricken from the Constitution. They further dedicated themselves to preserving the Constitution "from further mutilation by an organized fanatical minority."

Meantime, the newspapers were carrying messages from the mayors of such cities as Los Angeles, Grand Rapids, Des Moines, Nashville, Hartford and Bridgeport, Conn.; Oklahoma City and Wilmington, testifying to the beneficial effects of prohibition upon their respective communities.

Reduction in juvenile delinquency, thrift, greater efficiency in industry, mitigation of unemployment, decrease of workhouse population—these are among the results which are traced to the as yet imperfect operation of the law which banished the legalized traffic in liquor.

If this were the work of a "fanatical minority," we think it likely that should the anti-prohibitionists succeed in raising the issue again they would discover a fervent majority eager to confirm the minority's achievement.

But the idea that prohibition stands in the Constitution of the United States

Youngstown Couldn't Be Induced to go Back on Prohibition

While I am no longer mayor of the City of Youngstown, Ohio, I believe that I am in possession of the facts that enable me to answer the inquiries contained in the letter from THE UNION SIGNAL.

1. Prohibition of the liquor traffic has certainly been a benefit to our city in every way.

2. It has reduced drunkenness and the offenses that accompany that evil so tbat since prohibition went into effect here, our county jail has been rather a lonesome place and there are few drunks lodged therein as compared to former times.

3. I might say also in this connection that fewer drunken men are upon the streets and when one does appear he is picked up more readily for tbe reason that such a thing is more unusual than when the saloons were in operation. As to crime in this vicinity I must state that we have had considerable of that, due to other causes, I am sure, so tbat we cannot give statistics that would show a reduction of crime and yet I am certain tbat crime would have been a great deal worse during the last two or three years if the saloon had been in operation.

4. Due to the present industrial depression it is hard to state what its effect has been on the unemployment situation but I am sure that this situation would have been infinitely worse if we had not the advantage of two or three years' prohibition, during which time those who formerly squandered their means in the saloon were able to lay by money for the hard times.

5. The word that has come from the big industries since prohibition went into effect is that it has worked wonders in promoting greater efficiency and has brought about more steady employment on the part of employes.

6. On account of the industrial depression the savings accounts have been reduced in the last two years but prior to that time, from the going into effect of prohibition until the hard times came, there was a great increase in savings as shown by the bank deposits.

7. The effect of prohibition upon the health, happiness and prosperity of our community has been immeasurable and I am sure that nothing would induce the majority of our people to go back to the old system.

FRED J. WARNOCK.

Prohibition "Worth While"

"I believe prohibition has been worth while" writes James J. Thomas, mayor of Columbus, Obio, "but unemployment conditions being bad puts it at a disadvantage."

"Prohibition has been a benefit in some ways," writes Elliot Marshall, mayor of St. Joseph, Missouri. "It has reduced drunkenness. I think, too, it has promoted thrift, as the men who used to spend their money on liquor are probably either saving it or spending it somewhere else."

Mobilize a Million Members

Third Intensive Membership Campaign for 3 days each Week of 3 Weeks.

April 24–May 14

1. Have 3 canvassers for each day in small unions; multiples of 3 in large unions.
2. Interest 3 groups especially: (a) Women in the churches. (b) Young Women. (c) Women in business.
3. Get 3 supplies prepared for intensive campaign. Secure them from National W. C. T. U. Publishing House or from state W. C. T. U. headquarters.

"You'll Find Me at the Front"

Thousands of women who have felt they were too busily occupied with home and church duties to help the W. C. T. U. actively are realizing in the present crisis that so great is the need for all good women to unite against the common enemy of the home and family, that they cannot stay out of the W. C. T. U. The wife of Rev. George M. Stuart, the noted preacher of Birmingham, Alabama, in an address at the recent state W. C. T. U. institute in that city, voiced the feeling of this class of women in the following graphic word-picture:

"My father, an enthusiastic hunter, kept a fine pack of hunting dogs," said Mrs. Stuart. "Being privileged to go with him one day, I was keenly disappointed to note that my favorite hounds, 'Trueboy' and 'Lead,' were hanging back when the other dogs were getting into line. Then I saw they were eagerly watching for the signal that the trail had been struck—when that signal came, there was a race, and what a race, every muscle was strained, every nerve aquiver with eagerness to win. 'Lead,' like a flash was at the front!

"My increasing responsibilities as the wife of a busy city pastor do not permit me to take an active part in the present program of the local union of which I am a member, but if there should be a definite call to me to help in enforcing and holding the prohibition law, like 'Lead,' when I know you are "On the trail—on the chase—you will find me at the front!"

"No One Ever Asked Me"

It was at a big reception in a hotel of a western metropolis. The guests of honor were social welfare leaders, presidents of women's clubs, a governor and ex-governor, mayors, and attorney generals, and among them were prominent national and state W. C. T. U. officials. Standing near one of the white ribboners in the receiving line was a woman whose name is known from ocean to ocean as the president of a great national organization. Turning to her, the W. C. T. U. leader queried, "And you, too, wear the white ribbon, and are of our sisterhood?" The one addressed shook her head, looking a bit wistfully at the gleaming bows of white on the gowns of many of the women, "No, I am not of your sisterhood; no one ever asked me to join." Needless to say she gladly accepted the invitation then and there extended.

"No one ever asked me to join." There may be a hundred women within the circle of your acquaintance who can make this statement—they have never been asked to unite with the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. It is your privilege to see that not another week passes without their receiving an invitation to become a member of "organized mother love."

Suggestions For Membership Campaign

Make a complete list of the women in your town who should be members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, assigning each to some worker. If the first person fails, another worker should be appointed until possibly three different people have interviewed her.

Use literature liberally—through the mails, at meetings, and at the close of personal conversations.

Use the telephone, in an organized way, to secure members, utilizing, as the basis of a telephonic campaign, the names of women who have been previously selected.

Organize a definite letter writing campaign among the same group of women, making the tone as personal as possible. Use a form letter, generally agreed upon, as the basis of this appeal. Always enclose with the letter a piece of printed matter.

Bring together the women who are to seek others as members, that they may be definitely drilled on the talking points to be presented.

Organize teams, that the work may be conducted upon a competitive basis, thus arousing increased interest.

Organize the women workers in stores and factories, that they may carry on campaigns in their places of employment.

Make it clear, in all public announcements, that the W. C. T. U. is engaged in a campaign for a million members to promote a work which is patriotic, democratic, non-sectarian, and progressive.

Furnish the ministers in your community with concise, comprehensive facts to be used in church calendars, at prayer meetings, in sermons, and in other ways.

Arrange for exhibits of W. C. T. U. work in down-town stores, public libraries and wherever else the public can be reached, and establish traveling exhibits which may be sent from place to place.

Seek the co-operation of other social agencies, such as women's clubs, etc. This may be done because of the extended program now being carried out by the W. C. T. U.

Organize open forum discussions in each community, giving the people a chance to ask questions regarding the work in which the W. C. T. U. is engaged.

The Story of the "Star" Lady

The Mill River (California) W. C. T. U. recently gained a new member of whom it is very proud. Her name is on the title page of a dozen or more of the most wholesome and popular works of fiction meeting with large sale in our book stores and eagerly sought on the shelves of our public libraries. She is Kathleen Norris. At the invitation of a modest, busy young mother, president of the local union, she joined, and it didn't require any abstruse arguments or eloquent special pleading to bring her into the ranks. She apparently was only waiting to be asked. She is now known among white ribboners as the "Star Lady," for the beautiful idea of the "star in the window" was suggested by her in a magazine article. And thereby hangs a tale! Some months ago she was very seriously ill, and her physician warned her to "set her house in order" for he feared the end was near. She said to her husband that she wished she could live a little longer that she might be able to give at least five minutes of her life to the temperance cause. He told her he had just received a letter from McCall's Magazine, asking her to reply to Gertrude Atherton's article denouncing prohibition, which was to appear in the same number. Stimulated by the realization that this opportunity had been given her, she had herself propped up in bed and, with typewriter before her, indited her message for prohibition, knowing that the words might be the last from her pen. Toward the close she wrote, "I should like to put in my window a simple little banner of—what? Blue ground and white star? It would mean that in every possible way I and mine stood to our guns, at any cost of momentary embarrassment or social hurt. It would mean that liquor was neither permitted nor discussed in our house, that there was no smiling indulgence here toward breaking the law."

There may be in your community a "Kathleen Norris," rich in gifts of mind and heart, waiting to be asked to join the W. C. T. U. It is your privilege to find her, and bring her into the ranks.

Our cover page this week shows a group of charming little folk, the Kindergarten and Normal Training Class at the new headquarters of the Liga Templanza of the Republic of Argentina, South America, which is located in the suburbs of Buenos Aires. The purchase of the building was made possible by a gift from the Jubilee Fund of the National W. C. T. U. of the United States.

Three Qualifications For Success in Membership Campaign—Grace—Grit—Gumption

Frances P. Parks, National Corresponding Secretary

Grace: Your program of appeal must have as its basis a modernized crusade which embraces interest in the great pressing social and economic problems that are enlisting millions of women in women's clubs, in labor unions, in civic organizations and in the political field. The program of the W. C. T. U. must approach the objectives of other women's organizations from the Christian viewpoint. The invitation to unite must be to help hasten the coming of the Kingdom of God.

Grit: Study the methods followed in previous campaigns. Make a survey of the field to be covered in this campaign. Have the grit to drop bad or unsuccessful methods, the grit to follow the light afforded by the survey.

Gumption: Cultivate the press. Enlist the co-operation of the churches, the teachers, the business women! Conditions have changed. The viewpoint of the people to be reached must be recognized because, after all, the W. C. T. U. has a definite thing to "sell" and in order to make good it must be familiar with its field and with its prospects.

Don't Fail to Vote at the Primaries

It is the first duty of every citizen to vote at the primaries. Why? Because the primaries are for the express purpose of letting the people indicate directly how they shall be governed and by whom they shall be governed. Now is the time to scrutinize the records and reputation of candidates. Next November will be too late. The time to find fault and to sift the competent politician from the incompetent, the honorable from the self-seeking, the good from the bad is now—AT THE PRIMARIES.

What is the Answer to These Questions in Your Community?

Letters and questionnaires concerning the results of prohibition are coming to us from foreign countries, especially those engaged in definite campaigns for dry legislation. In their "battles against the bottle," they are seeking information to use as specific evidence of the value of prohibition. We are finding no difficulty in answering their queries, but in order to respond fully and with directness, we need constantly the very latest accurate facts from every state in the Union. That as many sections of the United States as possible may be represented in the data furnished our friends abroad, we suggest that every woman who reads this appeal shall make a personal investigation in her own town or city.

Here are the questions that have recently come to us from Australia:

1. Has prohibition proved of any special benefit to women? Has it had any marked effect on home life and social environment? Give definite instances, and tell your authority.

2. Has prohibition proved of benefit to children? If so, could you state why? (Get testimony from superintendent of schools and teachers; also the juvenile court.)

3. Has prohibition lessened prostitution? If so, have you any definite information, or can you refer to a society which could answer this question?

4. In your opinion, would people welcome a return to the open saloon?

5. Is the illicit selling of liquor due to prohibition comparable, as an evil, to the open saloon?

6. What effect has prohibition upon charities and philanthropies? (Ask your charitable organizations, Salvation Army, church benevolent societies, city missions.)

Send your answers to THE UNION SIGNAL, and we will see that they are used to advantage in this country and foreign lands to further total abstinence for the individual and prohibition for the nations.

A "Dead Question"

It was a luncheon of business and professional women, and at one of the long tables the conversation turned on the political situation. Some one spoke of the efforts to nullify the prohibition law, whereupon a well-read and earnest woman smilingly remarked in a superior way: "Oh, really, my dear, that question is simply dead. It will have no bearing upon the elections this year, you know."

The younger woman flushed a little, but held her ground. "But, Miss X——," she said, "didn't you see the account in the paper last night of the organizations that have been formed for that express purpose, thirty of them? The leaders state that they are definitely trying to elect Congressmen who will work and vote for the modification of the Volstead Act to permit the manufacture and sale of beer and wines."

Another woman pursued the subject: "Pardon me, but I happen to know that what you," turning to the last speaker, "have said is perfectly true. Let me tell you what I heard two wet men on the street car say the other day. They boldly stated that they and the wets, in general, are doing all they can to elect wet men and bring about nullification of prohibition. And you may be sure that since for the first time in the history of the reform prohibition has the advantage in the fight, being on the defensive, instead of having to attack, it is a life-and-death struggle for the liquor forces of this country, who are gathered together in a last wild attempt to bring back liquor."

The woman who had thought the prohibition question entirely "settled," looked embarrassed. "If all this is true—and I suppose it must be—" she said, "I shall have to admit that I am wrong. I have not been keeping up on that particular subject, I confess, and I certainly thought it was one question that might now be eliminated."

"Indeed, Miss X——," said the first woman, "did you not know that Commissioner Haynes himself said in one of his addresses that if the temperance organizations disbanded, in a brief space of time all their work of agitation, education, and legislation would have to be done over from the beginning. That is one reason why the W. C. T. U. is continuing to teach the children and foreign folk through Americanization work and scientific temperance instruction in the schools. We have a special department of Christian Citizenship, too, you know, which teaches women how to vote and the other duties of citizenship, and inculcates observance of, and reverence for, law. I wish you would join our local union. Your influence would mean a great deal, and it is particularly needed at such a critical time as the present. Won't you let me enroll you as one of us?"

"I'll think seriously about it," was the reply. "I can see that the question is of more importance than I had supposed."

And later she sought out the other woman, and gave her name for membership, actuated by her realization of the continued need for work along the lines stressed by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

America's Moral Energy

That other countries are keenly studying the workings of prohibition in the United States is evident. And they are not merely considering the question from the moral standpoint, or even that of "personal liberty," but from the economic standpoint, as shown by an editorial in the Arbeiter Zeitung, recently quoted in the American press. This paper remarks: "If impoverished Austria could summon half the moral energy the United States displayed in the suppression of drink she would soon have no need to go begging of all the world."

Compare, if you please, the statement of the Arbeiter Zeitung, which, as indicated by its name, stands for the working men of Austria, with that recently made by the executive council of the American Federation of Labor, recommending the lifting of the ban on the sale of "light wines and beer." That the workingman is not going to follow the lead of the council has been shown in various ways. He has just as clear a perspective of good government as the members of the executive council, and knows that to compromise on the Volstead Act would automatically kill the Eighteenth Amendment. Moreover, organized labor in general, far from appreciating the proposition advanced, resents the rulings of the council. Evidence of this is the statement made by the Labor Union Bulletin of Little Rock, Arkansas, which says, as quoted by the Paragould (Arkansas) Press:

"We know, as everyone must know, that prohibition laws have not been enforced as they ought to be, but this does not affect the right or wrong of prohibition itself. In our opinion, legalizing the sale of beer and wines would not lessen, but would increase the illegal traffic in strong liquors, and probably narcotics also, and make it even more difficult to enforce the laws against them. If prohibition is right, it should be enforced. If wrong, let it be repealed. And if prohibition is right, it is unworthy of organized labor to oppose it on the ground that its revocation will create more jobs for idle men. Labor should stand unflinchingly for the right, for in the long run it has all to lose by upholding wrong, even for temporary gain."

"The fact remains that the young men of the present generation are not learning to be drinkers," says the Goldfield (Nevada) Tribune. "Some few of them may be, but not many. Every man who runs an industrial establishment knows that this is true. Bleary eyes and foolish speech used to be common in the workrooms. Now they are seen and heard but seldom. Workmen are more intelligent, more reliable, more tractable. In the homes there is more happiness. There are more of the comforts of life. And the men, as well as the women, know it.

"For these reasons we doubt if a majority of the members of the American Federation of Labor will follow the advice of the wet members of their executive committee. They know when they and their wives and their children are better off."

"They All Had Excellent Labels"

"There are not ten men out of every hundred who have bought booze since prohibition went into effect who have not been faked, defrauded, imposed upon, cheated—stung," declared Samuel G. Blythe, in the Saturday Evening Post. "They will deny it of course, but that is the fact. The average American citizen and those above the average and below it are all alike. They may be good at their own affairs, but when they come to buy illicit liquor they are morons in a mist.

"And the stuff they drink! A customs official I know analyzed two hundred samples of booze he had seized before it got to the homes of our best people. Ninety-six per cent of it was bogus, faked, fraudulent and mostly poisonous. But it all had fine authentic labels on it, and revenue stamps and everything. A good deal of it was 'bottled in bond.'

"An enterprising Eastern newspaper, seeking to show that there was bootlegging going on in its fair city, sent out a reporter with enough money to buy ten bottles of so-called whisky from ten different sources of supply. The reporter came back in a short time with the stuff. The enterprising newspaper had the ten bottles chemically analyzed. There wasn't a bottle of real whisky in the lot. Mostly it was wood alcohol doctored, and two of the bottles contained water with coloring matter in it. But they all had excellent labels.

"They drink this stuff, thousands of apparently otherwise intelligent people. Some of it is so vile that they have to hold their noses while taking it, but they drink it. The booze complex admits of no qualms. It's ag'in the law, so they take it. It kills some of them and blinds others. Still, that is only when it is virulent poison, and not generally. What is happening, the big doctors say, is that this stuff—not poisonous enough to kill or blind at once—will surely induce organic disorders of various sorts and presently we shall observe large numbers of our leading booze-complexers dropping off under the inciting cause of maladies that their booze obsession induced."

Mrs. Margot Asquith and American Prohibition

While on her recent lecture tour in America, Mrs. Margot Asquith is reported to have made several references to prohibition. "The one thing she admires most in America is prohibition," says one press correspondent, while another declares that she claims that "prohibition is a farce." However, others in England do not agree with her.

Lord Lee, First Lord of the Admiralty, who has just returned to England from a visit to the United States, made an address before the English-speaking Union in London, March 7, at which, according to the press, referring to a statement attributed to Mrs. Asquith in America, to the effect that drunkenness was prevalent among young people of both sexes, he declared emphatically, "All I can say is that this statement is as ludicrous as it is cruel and untrue."

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awakening continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

A Prayer

Julia H. Thayer

Jesus, Savior, Christ Divine,
Breathe upon this soul of mine;
Thought, emotion, and desire
Purify with spirit-fire.

Jesus, Savior, Master, Friend,
In life's woes my heart defend;
Calm the tumult of its sea
With the word of Galilee.

Jesus, Savior, Star of Light,
Rise upon my straining sight
As earth's shadows flee away
In the morn of Heaven's day.

Imagining a Vain Thing!

as the act of a "fanatical minority" is one of those fond delusions which men cherish who believe things merely because they like to believe them. The campaign which ended with the adoption of the Eighteenth Amendment began with the agitation of a minority, which may be called "fanatical" if you so please. But the campaign succeeded because the minority had become the majority. Moral persuasions were re-enforced by economic arguments, and the combination won the victory.

The moral reasons for prohibition stand up; the economic arguments grow stronger. The Eighteenth Amendment with each year will become more firmly embedded in the nation's organic law. Patiently, lawfully and patriotically the anti-prohibitionists may continue their labors, but we warn them that in hoping to restore the pre-Volsteadian era they are "imagining a vain thing."

Minnesota's One-City-to-a-State Conference a Great Success

Bessie Lathe Scovell

Minnesota Woman's Christian Temperance Union, assisted by Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger, director of Americanization for the National W. C. T. U., and Mrs. Laura Parks Miller, of Women in Industry, held its one-city-to-a-state conference at Mankato. There was evidenced delightful hospitality on the part of the Mankato W. C. T. U., which entertained all delegates and members of the conference on the Harvard plan. Mankato citizens contributed much in music and attendance. One hundred and two delegates from all parts of the state, including three state officers, twelve state superintendents of departments, fourteen district presidents, eleven district officers and the editor of the state paper, were in attendance.

Mrs. Josephine E. Sizer, state president, who had been in the lecture field for several weeks, included in her itinerary Mankato, and presided over the conference. Mrs. Martha J. Reed, state treasurer, directed the song service at the opening of each session.

The opening prayer was made by the state recording secretary, Mrs. Myra Griswold. Mrs. Mary A. Vye, state superintendent of Christian Citizenship, gave an address on Americanization and Miss Rozette Hendrix, former state president and editor of the Minnesota White Ribbon, spoke on the Mother-Child Center which the Minnesota W. C. T. U. is endeavoring to establish in the twin cities.

Delightful music was rendered the first evening of the session by Mrs. E. H. Knehans and the Mankato Orpheus Quartet, and Mrs. Laura Parks Miller, director of Women in Industry for the National, with Miss Louise E. Schutz, director of Women and Children's Division of the Industrial Commission of Minnesota, shared the honors of the evening, speaking on their special lines of work.

Mrs. Josephine E. Sizer gave the keynote address. Mrs. Laura Parks Miller led in exploiting membership plans. Trio team work was recommended in securing members and UNION SIGNAL subscriptions. Miss Rozette Hendrix spoke on "Our Paper" and Mrs. M. M. Davidson gave a most excellent paper on "Women in Civic Affairs." It was voted to place this in the exchange bureau that local unions may have the benefit of its helpful suggestions.

The last hour of the forenoon session was given over to a round table discussion conducted by Mrs. Laura Parks Miller on "Making Departmental Plans Practical."

A three minute contest by the district presidents, on "How best to gain new members" enlivened the afternoon session and the prize, a W. C. T. U. pin, was won by Mrs. Helen R. Upton, president of the Fifth W. C. T. U. district.

Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger led the Law Enforcement section of the conference. Mrs. Nellie Colbrath, Seventeenth district Law Enforcement superintendent, spoke on Minnesota's enforcement law, and Mrs. Jennie Andrews on the election of dry Congressmen.

The evening session of the conference closed with Mrs. Vayhinger's masterful address on "Outwitting Our Enemies."

Dr. Nella Barsness, state superintendent of Health for Minnesota, went to Mankato for the first afternoon session to give an address on Health, returning to St. Paul in the evening to attend to patients. Thirty dollars was taken in collections during the conference. The Rozette Hendrix Birthday Fund has been created by the Minnesota W. C. T. U. to finance a mid-year conference each year. One hundred W. C. T. U. campaign song books were sold.

Minnesota's state W. C. T. U. annual convention will be held in St. Paul August 29-September 1. The convention will just precede the opening of the Minnesota State Agricultural Fair, September 2-9, which it is thought will mean a record breaking attendance at the state convention. The Civic and Commerce Association of St. Paul is to assist the St. Paul W. C. T. U. in entertaining the convention.

Mrs. Josephine E. Sizer, state president, has been appointed by the State Central Committee of the Minnesota W. C. T. U. to represent the state W. C. T. U. in the Anti-Law-Breaker's League of Minnesota. Mrs. W. R. Mandigo is her alternate.

A Meeting Both Profitable and Pleasant

A very profitable and pleasant meeting was recently held at the headquarters of the District of Columbia W. C. T. U., when the state officers entertained the superintendents. The morning was devoted to an instructive and helpful conference, following which a delicious luncheon was served. Prayers for the recovery of Miss Jennie Smith, a former national evangelist and for many years the loyal and faithful national superintendent of the department of Work Among Railroad Employes, were a special feature of the meeting. She had been very ill, and her many friends of the National W. C. T. U. as well as of the District union are expressing their heartfelt gratitude that she is again able to take up her work. A small token of love and esteem was presented to Miss Smith on this occasion by her white ribbon comrades, who feel that "Miss Jennie," as they lovingly think of her, is to them a real inspiration.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

THE "POLY PET" IN PEPVILLE AND HUSTLETOWN

"Special Correspondence" Dropped From the Mail Bag

Dear Bab:

How is your Polyglot Petition work progressing? Our Y. P. B. has two hundred signatures, and we expect to reach the 1,000 mark before the end of the month. How did we do it? System, my dear Bab, system! We assigned every square inch of the town, figuratively speaking, to the different members. Somebody for the Epworth League. Somebody for each Christian Endeavor Society, one each for every church. Five business women to visit the offices in the down-town district. We students camped on the trail of every member of our faculty, and then we began on the fraternities and sororities. Some peppy arguments and discussions on the prohibition question we are having, but it is really and truly, speaking seriously, educating the community. We Y. P. B.'s go around with a Polyglot Petition blank in our brief cases or Boston bags, and woe betide the man or woman who sits by our side on the suburban train or the street car, for out comes the "Poly Pet" and with it begins a nice little conversazione on World Prohibition (which just naturally links up with national prohibition), the Eighteenth Amendment, the necessity for electing dry Congressmen, and one's civic responsibilities. The work is really fascinating and affords a chance to talk on a lot of subjects—history, economics, civics, philosophy, and sociology. It's surprising how kindly the rank and file of people take to that line of talk.

Well, here's hoping you are doing well with the "Poly Pet" in Pepville. Call me on the long distance when you get your first thousand.

Yours for a Half-Million Signatures,

RUTH.

Dearest Ruth:

So the Y. P. B. of Hustletown thinks it is going to beat Pepville on the "Poly Pet" race? Well, you'll have to move rather rapidly if you accomplish that feat. But we accept the challenge, and you certainly are putting on a sprightly drive, judging from your letter. I read it to Jack Somerville, and he said, "Some brains down in Hustletown." If we haven't the same amount of gray matter in our cerebellum, or is it the cerebrum, we'll have to make up for it by working a bit more diligently. Do you know what is the most popular book in town just now? No, it isn't a novel, it's the city directory! We sit up nights reading it. We've divided the population of the town alphabetically, and from "A" for Adams to "Z" for Zimmerman we are becoming acquainted with our fellow-townsmen and townswomen. I drew the letter "S" and I am becoming quite chummy with the Smiths and the Snyders and the Solomons and a lot more of the saints and sinners. My circle of social activity is growing by leaps and bounds. The recital of my experiences at the dinner table each evening is so thrilling that my family, who usually hurry through dessert to go to the movies, linger to hear me talk. Dad says I ought to write a book on "The Peregrinations of the 'Poly Pet.'" I am thinking of offering the manuscript to the Anti-Prohibition Publishing Company. The tales I could relate of what people are saying of the organizations that want to tear prohibition out of the Constitution would be mighty stimulating reading for our "personal liberty" friends. By the way, expect in about two weeks that long distance message.

Yours for 500,000 Names to the "Poly Pet,"

BAB.

West Virginia's W. C. T. U. Conference and Institute Arouses to Progressive Work

Special Correspondence

The St. Paul Methodist church of Parkersburg was the scene of a very interesting and instructive institute presided over by the state president, Mrs. Olive C. Barnes of Charleston. The pastor, Rev. J. F. Baker, the president of the Parkersburg union, Mrs. Laura Swearengen, and the Y. W. C. A. most cordially and heartily welcomed the officers and delegates. The spirit of co-operation was inspiring.

A luncheon and executive committee meeting was held at the Y. W. C. A. The first session of the afternoon meeting was presided over by Mrs. Cora R. Ogden, state vice-president, the president being detained by the illness of her daughter. The devotional service was conducted by Mrs. Allie B. Jackson, state recording secretary.

A very interesting feature was an address on organized mother love by Mrs. Elizabeth A. Perkins, national director of Child Welfare. Mrs. V. E. Mohler, state superintendent of Child Welfare, gave some very interesting talks and presented some posters and charts on Child Welfare work.

Mrs. Frances Pride Parks, national corresponding secretary, told what the Jubilee Fund is accomplishing. Mr. W. H. Brown, state prohibition commissioner, called attention to the work being done in West Virginia to enforce the prohibition law and spoke of the difficulties attending its enforcement, urging the continued co-operation of the W. C. T. U. in upholding not only the prohibition law but all other laws. Mrs. Barnes introduced the speakers and also spoke at the close of the meeting.

Splendid plans for a membership campaign were presented, and interesting talks given by the delegates. The trio team, the idea of which originated with our own Mrs. Parks, that is, sending THE UNION SIGNAL to the president, secretary, and treasurer of each local union, was discussed by Mrs. Blanche M. Pickering, state corresponding secretary, and Mrs. Cora R. Ogden. Mrs. Parks spoke in detail of the various ways in which the W. C. T. U. can procure more workers. Ways of interesting missionary women, enlisting young mothers, plans for business women, use of literature, and winning church women were other subjects discussed. Mrs. S. H. D. Wise also paid a tribute to pioneer local workers.

Mrs. Parks paid an eloquent tribute to the women of West Virginia for the part they had in the great prohibition movement. She also told of the general work of the National W. C. T. U. and its plans for the future, explaining what is done with the Jubilee Fund.

Most interesting were the conferences between presidents, secretaries, treasurers and superintendents, and a round table discussion of practical work by Mrs. Alta Clemans, Clarksburg county president, Mrs. Cora R. Ogden, superintendent of Anti-Narcotics and Scientific Temperance Instruction, Lillie May Fisher, state treasurer, Mrs. Rena Woofter, Buckhannon, Mrs. W. H. Haymond, Clarksburg local president, Mrs. Mollie P. Jackson, superintendent of Social Meetings and Red Letter Days, Mrs. Iva Cooper, superintendent of Women in Industry, Dr. Estalee Martha Chalfant, Medical Temperance, Mrs. V. E. Mohler, superintendent of Child Welfare.

An exhibit which belongs to Mrs. Mohler, was an excellent supplement to the very interesting addresses by Mrs. Elizabeth Perkins and Mrs. Laura Parks Miller. Mrs. Mohler spoke of the flowers and other comforts that are taken daily to the soldiers and sailors in the Walter Reid Hospital in Washington. Mrs. Mohler's daughter, Mrs. Edith Mohler Sweet, superintendent of the department of Soldiers and Sailors, was not able to attend, but her dear little boy, Robert Mohler Sweet, six years old, came with his grandmother and all enjoyed having him present.

At the state executive meeting plans were made for adopting the Soldier's Hospital at Ft. McHenry, Maryland, as our beneficiary. Post-cards, pictures, magazines and other comforts are to be sent.

Plans were made to place the Law Observance Stars in the windows May 30 and keep them up until after June 14.

The state executive was much encouraged by the presence and influence of our former state corresponding secretary and state president, Mrs. Parks. West Virginia appreciates the honor of having two of her former presidents hold national office, and also is grateful when one or the other is loaned to us for even a few short hours.

W. C. T. U. work in West Virginia is strongest where it touches the lives of the children—Scientific Temperance Instruction in the Public Schools, including Anti-Narcotics, Medical Temperance, Social Morality and Mothers' Meetings.

The white ribbon benediction closed a notable and helpful session from which West Virginia white ribboners returned to their homes uplifted and strengthened, ready to serve the Master with renewed consecration.

At the evening meeting Judge L. N. Tavener delivered an able address on the enforcement of law, particularly the prohibition law. Mrs. Elizabeth A. Perkins explained the many ways in which the W. C. T. U. can better the condition of the children in the respective communities. L. H. Putnam, state secretary of Children's Guardians, told something of what is being done along the line of child welfare in West Virginia and asked the co-operation of the W. C. T. U. wherever it is possible to better conditions.

An Entertaining Autobiography

is "The Diary of a South African" by M. M. Steytler (whose pen name is M. M. Steyn), a merchant of Port Elizabeth, South Africa. The book gives a vivid description of the writer's boyhood, a picture of life in a good class Dutch circle, and the story of the early days in the diamond fields. Its keenest interest to our readers will be its recital of the tale of how Mr. Steytler gave up the sale of alcoholic beverages, became a total abstainer, and endeavored to influence others to follow his example. W. C. T. U. HISTORY IN THE MAKING

"WE ARE HUMAN SPIRIT LAMPS WHOSE RAYS SHOULD BE DIRECTED AND INTENSIFIED BY THE BLOW-PIPE OF AN UNCEASING PURPOSE"
—Frances E. Willard.

The Atlanta Constitution, the oldest and probably the largest daily in Georgia, with the largest circulation, has promised to give an entire page on Mother's Day to pictures of W. C. T. U. mothers, grandmothers and great-grandmothers, with a special article by Mrs. August Burghard, state publicity director, on "Organized Mother Love."

So many of our prominent W. C. T. U. women are receiving licenses to preach that we find it difficult to keep a record of them. We are informed that Mrs. Josephine E. Sizer, president of the Minnesota W. C. T. U., has held such a license for over a year.

Hastings (Neb.) union has placed a Bible on the desk of every teacher in the city—sixty-eight Bibles.

At a contest held at the Mexican mission in Carlsbad, New Mexico, Sam Diego was winner of the medal. The judges were two Mexican men and one Mexican woman.

The Olympia (Wash.) W. C. T. U. has just completed a fine membership drive, in which it gained 170 new members.

A silver medal contest was held recently in Gillette, Wyoming, receipts, forty dollars. If every union in the state would hold a contest with equally good results, it would help all lines of work.

"The United States Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board in its work to remove temptations of vice and its consequences from the men in the armed service of the Government," writes Valeria H. Parker, M. D., executive secretary of that board and National W. C. T. U. director of Social Morality, "has found that earnest, active women have been the greatest aid in securing clean community conditions."

"Last March our branch," writes Alice Scott, of Sutton, Surrey, England, "started a local press campaign and I find great pleasure in preparing short weekly notes for the papers. They have to be paid for but they attract much attention and bring many replies from opponents, and we have an opportunity to get in a great deal more information free as the editor quotes from our letters replying to correspondents. We welcome this glorious chance of refuting misstatements (sometimes absolutely untruths) which appear in our daily press and in this way we educate many people who know nothing of the scientific side of the question, on which we are woefully behind America. The UNION SIGNAL is an immense help in preparing notes and answering critics and I value it highly. We watch with intense interest America's struggle for the enforcement of prohibition, realizing how much depends on it.

The W. C. T. U. of Charlevoix, Michigan, is holding a membership drive to close with its April meeting. The membership is divided into four circles, each with a chairman and secretary-treasurer. The circles are formed according to the neighborhoods, each chairman to select four workers. Points are counted for new members, attendance at meetings, dues paid, subscriptions to papers, and money raised for local work; the successful circle to be banqueted by the other three. It looks as if the plan would be a winner.

Rocky Grove (Pa.) W. C. T. U. has just closed one of the liveliest of membership contests and as a result has increased its enrollment from 60 to 363. Mrs. C. E. Neely, captain, with Mrs. Harvey Bagott and Mrs. O. K. Jolly, first and second lieutenants, represented the gold side; Mrs. Clyde Bowers, captain, and Mrs. C. F. Riler and Mrs. A. W. Nickle, first and second lieutenants, the Green side. The golds won by five points. The losers were pledged to entertain the winners.

How Englewood (Chicago) W. C. T. U. Gained 269 New Members

Mrs. L. T. Regan, President

THE UNION SIGNAL asks me to tell how Englewood union secured so many new members last year. In other years our women have had fair success in this direction because some of them always carried in their handbags pledge-cards and leaflets, hoping to enroll new members. Last year we added the plan of organizing the W. C. T. U. women in each church, to get members for the union in their own church and we like the idea so well that we are trying it again.

The union appointed a head captain to direct the campaign. The co-operation of the pastor having been gained, a church captain was chosen in each church that was canvassed. All the other W. C .T. U. members in the church were her lieutenants. Posters were placed in the churches and pastors commended the movement.

The lieutenants were supplied with pledge-cards and leaflets, and each explained to each woman on her list the purposes of the W. C. T. U. and asked her to join. The work was reported by the church captains to the head captain.

A very important thing about the plan was the nine o'clock prayer time for the success of the campaign for law enforcement which each member was asked to observe in her home, or wherever she might be. Prayer brings things to pass.

We believe that holding members already secured is as important as getting new ones, so we divide our membership among collectors, who, when the dollar dues has not been paid at a meeting, call or write for it. No woman is allowed to reach the end of the year without being given an opportunity to pay her dues. Consequently, we seldom lose a member except by death or removal.

The Lebanon (New Hampshire) union has discovered a way to raise money. Each member puts into an envelope pennies to correspond with the day of the month on which she was born. About fifteen dollars was realized in this way and by auctioneering a quilt and food.

"Grandma" Downer, an eighty-four-year-old member of the Central union of Aurora, Illinois, makes each month a little crib patchwork quilt for use at the Neighborhood House, an Americanization center supported by the Aurora Missionary Union and the W. C. T. U.

Mrs. Etta Mendenhall, state superintendent of Medal Contest work for Florida, has obtained the promise of the superintendent of Public Instruction, Professor Knight, to take up contest work in the public schools.

A most interesting series of meetings, under the auspices of the Rachel Fox W. C. T. U., was recently held in Burbank, a suburb of San Jose, California. Writing of it, one of our workers says: "We commenced at half past one in the afternoon, and went to eight different homes on as many different streets, giving one-half hour each to a home. This was the program: Ten minutes for introductory remarks; ten minutes for a talk on the state-wide enforcement law which is to be brought before the voters at the next election on referendum by the wets; ten minutes' talk on the part of the state W .C. T. U. in this campaign, followed by closing remarks, thanking the hostess for inviting in her neighbors and extending an invitation to come to a mass meeting to be held in the school house in the evening. The husband of the president of the union, Mrs. Maude P. Boynton, conveyed the speaker in his car from house to house, and blew his horn when the time allotted for the meeting had expired. About seventy women were reached in this way, and a good advertisement given of the evening gathering. At this meeting Mrs. Sara J. Dorr, former president of the California, North, W. C. T. U., and E. Tully Knowles, were the speakers."

Three contests took place in Swedeburg, Nebraska, receipts thirty-six dollars.

The Kennett (Mo.) W. C. T. U. recently held a law enforcement rally at the home of one of its members, to which were invited the husbands of members, the ministers and other prominent citizens as special guests. Mr. Orville Zimmerman, a prominent lawyer, made a strong plea for observance of the law for the sake of the future citizens. Dr. T. J. Rigdon spoke on "The Vital Importance of United Support of the Prohibition Law," and Mr. T. H. Masterson on "The World looks to Us for Moral Leadership." Delightful music, readings, and other special features, made the occasion a delightful one.

The Enemy

Frances S. Hallowes

(The S. S. "Persia", bound for India, has among its passengers Major Orde and Bertram Harford, who have become acquainted with a Mrs. Carlyle, her small son, Eric, and Angela O'Connor, who, in the charge of Mrs. Carlyle, is on her way to marry a Deputy Commissioner at Seraneb. Harford, who is a total abstainer, is glad to note that Angela refuses to drink, and the two become good friends. Consequently, Harford is much shocked to learn that Angela has been induced by Mrs. Carlyle to take some whisky for seasickness and has been overcome by the liquor. Through pity for her he breaks his reticence on the subject, and tells her that both his parents were victims of drink, and that he had promised his mother on her deathbed never to touch alcohol in any form. Angela admits that she has made her mother a similar promise, but does not mention any particular reason therefor. At Bombay Angela is met by her fiance, Frank Fortescue, and the wedding takes place. After a long railroad journey they arrive at Seraneb. During the course of the first dinner in the new home, Fortescue urges wine upon his wife, much to the distress of Divan Singh, a Christian native in charge of Fortescue's establishment.)

CHAPTER XI.

"I want to speak to you, Frank," said Angela, with an odd hesitation and fluttering nervousness of manner.

Fortescue had returned, and was lounging in the verandah with his wife beside him. It had been a very hot day, and the sunset brought fresh energy and life to the drooping girl wife.

Frank smiled. "Speak on, little angel," he said, stroking her cheek caressingly.

"You will not be angry if I say what you do not like?" she asked wistfully.

"Do you think I look a savage?"

"No, no, Frank! well, it is this. I want you to give up putting wine on our table, for," she went on hurriedly, "I think drink is a dreadful thing, and everyone is better without it."

"My dear child! What an absurd notion."

"Now, Frank, do not say 'No'; my heart is set on this. You know, Mother asked me never to take wine or spirits, and I promised her. But if it is on our table, I shall find it very difficult to keep my promise."

Frank gave her a quick, puzzled glance. "What was your mother's reason for getting this promise from you? Is she an abstainer?"

"She never takes it, and she says I shall be better without it."

"What nonsense, little woman! I don't agree with your mother's view, and you little know what you ask. Everyone in India takes it. How can we entertain without wine? No one would come to our dinners."

"Would they not? Do people only come for what they can get?"

"Little innocence!" he laughed, and kissed her. "Put away such a silly idea, and make up your mind, as you are in India, to do as India does."

"Then, Frank dear," and she bent towards him with a soft, caressing gesture, "promise me you will not ask me to take it at our own table, or at any one's else."

"I hope my wife will not make herself ridiculous with her teetotal notions," he replied stiffly.

Angela frowned. "And you refuse to give me this promise?" she asked.

Fortescue laughed and took her slim white hand and kissed it. "My wife must not make herself peculiar or unpopular. It would bring me into contempt."

"Frank, do you love me? Me, myself, my soul and intellect, or is it only my body, as belonging to you, that you care for?" she asked suddenly, with a quick intuition of his egoism.

"My dear child, you are my queen, chosen out of the whole world. What a question to ask!"

She felt his answer was evasive, but said no more.

"Put on your prettiest gown, and let us go to the Club for an hour."

They were soon driving under the bright stars to the Club, where the Europeans of the station gathered each evening for social intercourse.

"Here is the ladies' room," said Fortescue as they entered a spacious, lofty apartment.

It seemed to Angela a delightful place, with its soft blue and white carpets, its wicker lounges and chairs, its groups of ferns, palms, flowers and electric lights.

Little knots of people sat talking together, drinking tea or wine. In an alcove at one end several bridge parties were busy. Critical and inquiring eyes were lifted upon Angela as she came in. The bride of the Deputy Commissioner was a person of interest. Angela's perfect face was slightly flushed, but she looked very winning and lovely as she was introduced to one after another.

"What will you take, Mrs. Fortescue?" asked Colonel Green, one of her new friends.

"Nothing, thank you."

"Nothing?" he looked astonished.

Fortescue frowned.

"My wife is not accustomed to drinks between meals."

"Ah! a very good habit, Mrs. Fortescue, and one I wish society in India would adopt," responded Colonel Green, who was the Civil surgeon of the district.

"Come now, Green," laughed a man near, "don't try to cut off our pegs, or you'll find yourself unpopular."

Colonel Green laughed satirically. "No fear of that! a poor beggar like me has to go with the tide, whatever his private opinions are."

Angela listened with a sinking heart. How strong were the social customs which could make a professional man speak like this! She understood a little better the reasons of her husband's prejudices against her own abstinence. He evidently worshipped popularity, and that his wife should appear peculiar was abhorrent to him.

In the midst of her social triumph as the lovely bride of an important official there was something absent. Yes, there was definite pain, furtive and almost unacknowledged, at the lack of sympathy in her husband. Even more there was a glimmering sense of her want of confidence and respect in her feeling towards him.

Thoroughly disheartened by her failure to persuade Frank to give his consent to the banishment of alcohol from their table, she allowed herself to drift, taking things as they came, without any resistance. The next few weeks were spent in a whirl of gaiety. Like a butterfly she fluttered in the sunshine of admiration and adulation. Her freshness and pure beauty of face and form proved an attraction for young and old. A little train of admirers, military and civil, were always at luncheons and dinners, races and garden parties. She drank champagne with some, learnt bridge from others, and generally tuned herself into harmony with the dominant note of the Station.

Her husband rejoiced in his wife's social success, but he watched her narrowly least his prestige should suffer by any lapse of "form" on her part.

The W. C. T. U. Service Flag of Northumberland County, Pennsylvania

Clara H. Park, Recording Secretary

In 1912 one of the local unions of our county received a bequest of real estate. In order to accept this gift it was necessary for us to secure a charter for both the county and local unions, and to raise the money the county executive established a County Honor Roll and Certificate Fund, placing names of members on the roll at five dollars each. A small sum was given by each local union to make our county president the first life member and the life certificate was presented to her in convention.

At our county executive committee meeting in April, 1921, it was announced that it would be necessary for our county to raise three hundred dollars to meet the expense of entertaining the state W. C. T. U. convention to be held at Sunbury, and it was decided to make a service flag and place on it stars representing the names on our honor roll, blue stars for active members and gold stars for memorial members.

Four yards of the best satin-finished silk were used. On a deep valance edged with gold fringe are placed the stars representing our state president, and our county presidents, of whom there are four to date, our county having had only three presidents up to the time of the adoption of national constitutional prohibition. Two of these are kept in loving remembrance by gold stars. The third, Miss Margaret H. Watson, has given to the work thirty-one years of devoted service, and, as honorary president for life, still attends our executive meetings and gives us the benefit of her wisdom and experience.

The service flag is forty by sixty-six inches in size set with one-hundred-and-two gold and blue stars arranged in the form of a large star in the center of the flag.

The proceeds from the flag were $445, from which sum the bills incurred by the county in entertaining the state convention were all paid with a small margin over. This amount, added to what we used at the time of securing our charter, makes the $510 as represented by the stars.

The chief purpose of the flag is to remind us of the heroic efforts of the "pioneers" of the cause who championed prohibition when standing for it often meant "to be alone with God," enduring ridicule, slander and persecution for the work's sake.

The money is given to sustain the temperance work of our county. One young man said, "I want to do something in memory of my mother. All I am in the world, I owe to her." One mother paid for herself, two daughters and a son. A man paid for himself and wife to be counted among the pioneers. Churches paid for the name of the pastor's wife. Our honorary president paid for eleven pioneers; our county treasurer for ten pioneers from her home town. One lady paid for deceased T. L. B. members. Who can measure the influence of a memorial certificate in a family of children? People who were charter members in our county but who have since been active workers in other parts of the state, or in other states, are kept in touch with us by means of the life certificate.

The state president paid for the placing on the roll of the name of the only diamond medal holder in this part of the state.

New names are added each month.

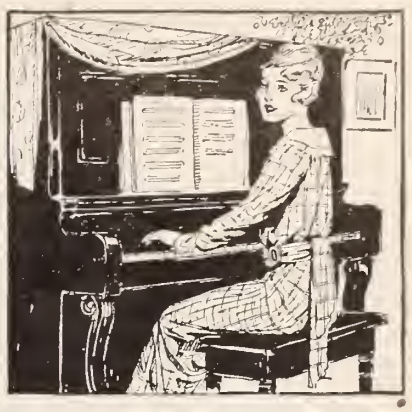
The Woman Who Wished She Could Play the Piano

And How She Found an Easy Way to Turn Her Wish Into a Fact



A YEAR or so ago this woman didn't know one note from another. Today she plays the piano—entirely by note—better than many who have been playing for years. Here she tells how she learned and why it was so easy. Thousands of others, from school children to men and women of 50 to 60, have also learned music in the same easy way.

FROM the time I was a child, I have always had a yearning and longing to play the piano.

Often I felt that I would gladly give up half of my life if some kind fairy would only turn my wish into a fact. You see, I had begun to think I was too old to learn, that only some sort of fairy-story magic could give me the ability to play. I was 35 years old—and the mother of a small family—before I knew one note from another.

Until I learned to play, hearing music—especially the piano—always gave me almost as much pain as pleasure. My enjoyment of it was always somewhat soured by envy and regret—envy of those who could entertain and charm with their playing, regret because I myself had to be a mere listener. And I suppose it is that way with every one who has to be satisfied with hearing music instead of playing it.

Again and again, parties and other social gatherings have been all but spoiled for me. I could enjoy myself until some one suggested music or singing; then I felt "left out"—a lonesome wall flower—a mere on-looker, instead of part of the party. I was missing half the fun.

The way I have suddenly blossomed out in music (almost over-night, you might say) has been a big surprise to all who know me, and to myself as well. My friends seem to think it must be that I had a previously undiscovered genius for the piano. But if there was any genius about it it wasn't on my part, but in the lessons I took—a new and simplified method that makes it remarkably easy for anyone to add music or singing to their daily lives. Anyone anywhere can now learn to play any instrument or learn to sing just as easily as I did. All the hard part, all the big expense, all the old difficulties, have been swept away by this simple new method.

I learned entirely by home study—in my spare time—from fascinating Print-and-Picture lessons that make everything so simple and easy that one simply can't go wrong on them. I call it a short-cut way to learn—it is so much simpler and so entirely different from the old and hard-to-understand methods. I know that I made better and faster progress than I ever could by bothering with a private teacher or joining a class. In fact, while I don't like to brag, within six months after I took my first lesson, my playing was better than that of many of my friends who had studied two or three years under private teachers.

My only regret is that I didn't know of this really wonderful method years before. The ability to play is such a great comfort. No matter how much I am alone, I never get lonesome—I can always turn to my piano for amusement, I am never at a loss for a way to entertain callers. I no longer feel that I am "out of it" at social gatherings. Do you wonder that I so gladly recommend the method that has brought me so much pleasure and satisfaction?

This woman's experience is by no means unusual. Over 250,000 others—from school children to men and women of 50 and 60—have learned to play their favorite instrument or learned to sing in the same way this woman did. Largely through the recommendations of satisfied pupils, we have built up the largest school of music in the world.

Whether for beginners or advanced pupils, our method is a revolutionary improvement of the old and hard-to-learn methods used by private teachers, and our method is as thorough as it is simple and easy. We teach you in the only right way—teach you to play or sing entirely BY NOTE. No "trick" music, no "numbers," no make-shifts of any kind. Yet it is a short-cut method, simply because every step is made so simple and clear, and the total cost averages a few cents a lesson, with your music and everything included.

When learning to play or sing is so easy, why continue to confine your enjoyment of the music to mere listening? Why not at least let us send you our free book? Just now we are making a special offer that cuts the cost per lesson in two—send your name now, before this special offer is withdrawn. How Can It be Brought About?

"I have found so often that when I want help along some line on the prohibition question, I discover what I need in THE UNION SIGNAL," writes a prominent W. C. T. U. worker in Massachusetts. "Never before have I so appreciated the paper. It is a veritable George Washington, and I wish it were possible to have it go forth as a hatchet to smash into the 'think-tanks' of the indifferent and the prejudiced. The people perish for lack of knowledge, and it is borne in upon me how important it is to put THE UNION SIGNAL into homes where nothing but the negative side of the question is ever heard or read. I wish it were possible to flood this country with our paper. HOW CAN IT BE BROUGHT ABOUT?"

We suggest two ways that will help to "bring it about"—

FIRST, get every Trio Team and every member of the W. C. T. U. to taking and reading THE UNION SIGNAL.

SECOND, take action at your local union meeting to appropriate a fund for special subscriptions or copies of THE UNION SIGNAL (especially the Law Enforcement Edition), to be placed in waiting stations, public libraries, community centers, rest rooms of department stores, restaurants and hotels.

If Every Superintendent Would Do Likewise

I am sure you will be interested to know that this superintendent has subscribed for THE UNION SIGNAL for many, many years (always two copies, so one can be kept on file and the other be used to good purpose). Also I send each year complimentary subscriptions to our pastors, the schools, board of trade, reading room, city library, etc. (about twelve in all). The money used for these subscriptions is just a bit from my tithe fund belonging to the Master. I do not care for any premiums unless it means more SIGNALS with which to do good.

The new magazine is to be The India Temperance News and White Ribbon and there are great hopes for its wide circulation and enhanced usefulness. Its entire control remains with the W. C. T. U.

Devotional services each morning and noon brought all hearts into real fellowship with the great Leader of our cause, and the successive notes of prayer and hope and faith and praise lifted the convention to new levels of courage and consecration. A new thing for Madras was the opening of a dozen pulpits on Sunday to our women speakers and everywhere new friends were made for the W. C. T. U.

The evening meetings were crowded, standing room being found only some feet away from the open doors and windows. There was a gold medal contest of high standard and on a succeeding evening a stereopticon presentation of Indian pictures illustrating Hari Das. This dramatic and truly Indian temperance story, popular wherever known, and now read in several vernaculars, was briefly told by Dr. Maud Allen under whose direction the slides had been prepared.

In view of Miss Campbell's very strenuous work the convention voted to interrupt her five-year program by allowing her to visit the U. S. A. and timing her visit so that she can attend the World's Convention in November. In addition, a strong delegation was elected to represent India there.

At the convention held in November, 1919, about 3,000 members were reported including all classes of membership. At this convention 9,000 were reported, more than 3,000 being members of the mother organization alone. Some very spectacular advances have been made, as in the Bombay division, which has grown from ten members reported in 1919 to 2150 in 1922, including all four units. The name of the auxiliary for men and boys now eligible for honorary membership is to be changed to the Blue Ribbon Temperance Association and Mr. A. Hoffert, M. A. was elected superintendent of this department.

The following officers were elected: President, Mrs. F. B. Price; corresponding secretary, Mrs. E. M. Moffatt; treasurer and statistical secretary, Mrs. Ewan; recording secretary, Mrs. J. Vardon; editor, Miss M. E. Archibald; activities editor, Mrs. W. L. Ferguson.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

SUGGESTED LEGISLATION TO DEAL WITH LIQUOR TRAFFIC OUTSIDE THREE-MILE LIMIT —PLEA FOR AMERICANISM—NAVY PERSONNEL OF 86,000 VOTED BY THE HOUSE— METRIC SYSTEM ADVOCATED

LENNA LOWE YOST, National W. C. T. U. Legislative Representative, Washington, D. C.

The proposed establishment of a recreation ship just outside the three mile limit from New York and other vessels to be used in carrying liquor in violation of the law, has raised the issue as to what can be done with these vessels. If the vessel carries the United States flag and sells liquor it is, of course, violating existing laws. It is unlikely that American ships will be used in such traffic. Ships of foreign registry are actually engaged in supplying liquor to our shores without coming into port and it is proposed that such vessels be stationed just outside our principal cities. Here follows a sample of advertising in printed bulletins of the Recreation Ticket Corporation of New York City:

"Europe Brought to New York City"

"We reiterate that the purpose of this vessel is to make available to this community samples of European entertainment; a world novelty of fascinating interest brought close to New York City; the first and only opportunity for millions of Americans to experience for themselves the atmosphere of Paris, London, Madrid and Pekin truly represented.

"If the serving of genuine wines, beers and champagne is a natural and lawful part of such entertainment, such serving will not constitute the object of the American Recreation Vessel, but it would be an appropriate incident in an atmosphere of festivity; enchanting orchestrations, the most beautiful of Europe's women, selected for their artistic ability as exponents of classic and fancy dancing and operatic singing, and a feast prepared by the best chefs from abroad."

To adequately meet this situation, legislation is necessary. Federal officers dealing with this problem have suggested the following amendment to be added as a proviso to section 581 of the Tariff Bill as passed by the House:

"If there be found on any vessel, articles the importation of which is prohibited generally or for certain use or uses, intended to be landed in this country contrary to law, or intended to be sold or furnished to persons residing in or coming from the United States, or if such articles having been on board have been so landed, sold or furnished, the vessel and all such articles shall be seized and forfeited and the master upon conviction shall be subject to the penalties provided in Section 593 (b) for violation of that section."

By best authorities it is believed that the three mile limit is not a fixed boundary, but, on the contrary it has been treated merely as a convenient minimum limit, the maximum limit being left to the reasonable discretion of each nation in accordance with its needs. Regarding the views other nations will take, every nation has the right to legislate with regard to its internal affairs, to permit or to prohibit certain acts within its territorial jurisdiction. And it has the right to make the execution of its laws effective even when in so doing it is found necessary to extend its jurisdiction over adjacent waters. For another nation to question this right would be to question its independent sovereignty. As to what distance these limits shall be extended the nation making them must be the sole judge.

Plea For Americanism

Mrs. George Maynard Minor, President General of the Daughters of the American Revolution, in her annual message to the Thirty-first Continental Congress, which has been in session here this week, warned against the "false democracy" which she believes is seeking to overturn our representative form of government and replace it with mob rule.

Mrs. Minor appealed to the members, "as guardians of the pure fire of patriotism and love of native land," to prevent the ascendancy of such a spirit and charged that it was their most "sacred duty" to concern themselves with these dangers and to promote true internationalism, "through which the nations are bound together in the bonds of mutual faith and trust while preserving their national identity." She characterized the danger as "the false democracy of the socialist and communist." "It is the more insidious because it masquerades as true democracy, deceiving the people," declared Mrs. Minor. "It masquerades also as 'industrial democracy,' founded on groups, industries, trades and classes as the political unit, instead of on geographical districts or numerical divisions of the whole people, regardless of class or occupation."

Mrs. Minor asserted that our democracy is assailed by yet another danger—the slacker voter—both male and female.

"There are startling statistics revealed by the last census," she said, "which show that millions of eligible voters in this country are too indifferent to go to the polls. Out of 54,421,832 eligible voters, 27,763,966 did not take the trouble to cast their vote; over one-half of our electorate, in other words, failed in this most sacred duty of citizenship, and of this failure the women must bear their full share of responsibility.

"If 27,000,000 voters care so little who govern them that they voluntarily renounce the priceless privilege of self-governing mankind, they have the kind of rulers they deserve. What shall be the end of our democracy if our citizens are so careless of this great duty and moral obligation of the ballot?"

More than 2,700 delegates have been in attendance at the annual meeting.

Egg Rolling Day After Easter An Annual Festival

Fifteen thousand children thronged the White House grounds during the morning and afternoon of Monday following Easter to enjoy the annual egg rolling festival. Only grown-ups acting as guardians were admitted to the grounds until 3:30, when they were opened to everyone. All the kiddies were armed with well-filled baskets of many colored eggs when they started forth in the morning.

President and Mrs. Harding appeared on the south porch of the White House about one o'clock and waved a greeting to their little guests, and Laddie Boy, filled with the friendly Easter spirit, did everything a dog could be expected to do to show how happy he was to have visitors in his big playground. He raced down the porch steps, romped along the fringe of the crowds, then back again to stand beside the President, and barked his greeting to the happy throngs below.

Navy Personnel of 86,000 Voted by the House

The House committee report for a personnel of 67,000 for the Navy was defeated and the personnel raised to 86,000 by a vote of 279 to 78.

The contention of the President and Secretary Hughes that a reduction to 67,000 would prevent this country from maintaining the fleet ratio provided by the naval reduction treaty was the influence that raised the personnel to the higher number.

Metric System Advocated

The Britten-Ladd Bill, designed to secure the advantages of the commercial use of the metric system of weights and measures over a liberal transition period of ten years, has had consideration by the subcommittee of the Senate Manufactures Committee.

The interest in the Britten-Ladd Bill plainly shows that the people of the country are now alive to the necessity of adopting the metric system of weights and measures. Over one hundred recognized national organizations have endorsed the international metric system for adoption in this country. The state legislatures of Illinois, California, Tennessee and North Dakota have recently petitioned Congress for this legislation. Utah took similar action several years ago.

Since George Washington first advocated standardization of weights and measures, there have been repeated efforts to unify our weights and measures. Instead of simplification, however, we now have utter confusion. There are about 150 ambiguous terms in our present system.

Practically all the major powers, with the exception of Great Britain and the United States, have scrapped their inefficient standards for the simple, decimal, international metric system. The metric system was made legal in the United States in 1866, and, rapidly gaining its way on its merits, is today widely used in American industry, science, and education.

Senator E. F. Ladd of North Dakota introduced the measure in the Senate and Fred A. Britten of Illinois in the House.

As the women of this country are interested in helping to eliminate fraud and inefficiency in the purchase of commodities, they should give their earnest attention to this important American question.

Ohio now claims three justices out of the nine on the bench of the United States Supreme Court, Chief Justice Taft and Justices William R. Day and John Hessin Clarke. Judge Day was appointed by President Roosevelt, Judge Clarke by President Wilson, and the Chief Justice by President Harding. The first-named has been on the Supreme bench eighteen years.

Texas Police Records Prove That Prohibition Pays

Police records quoted by Home and State (Texas) do not indicate that under prohibition crime is increasing. The report of the Dallas commissioner of police gives the number of arrests in 1917, the last wet year, as 4,141, and in 1921, 2,200; a decrease of 1,941. The jail population decreased 75 per cent. Arrests for disturbing the peace, usually the result of drunkenness, were 1,002 in 1917. In 1921 there were 751.

Bear in mind Dallas had 30,000 more population in 1921 than in 1917, yet the remarkable decrease in crime.

Mr. Gordon Murphy, superintendent of police in Houston, under date of January 14 reports for that city, as follows: Arrests for drunkenness from April 15, 1917, to April 15, 1918, the last wet year, 1,470. For the year 1921, 787, showing a decrease of 683.

Texas has been under prohibition since June 26, 1918, when the state prohibitory law became operative.

Arrests for all causes in Galveston dropped from 2,468, the last wet year before national prohibition, to 2,155 the first year after national prohibition; and in San Antonio from 16,350 the last year before national prohibition to 8,600 the first year after national prohibition. In Houston the arrests for drunkenness dropped from 1,470 in the last year before national prohibition to 368 the first year after national prohibition.

Number of Arrests—All Causes

	Last Wet Year	Latest Data

Waco	8,100	3,940
San Antonio	16,350	8,600

Beer Advocates Again Appeal In Vain to the City Council of Columbus, Ohio.

In harmony with the majority sentiment of the voters, the city council of Columbus, Ohio, has for the second time refused to go on record as favoring a modification of the Volstead law to permit the sale of light wines and beer.

Pasadena (Cal.) Chamber of Commerce Favors Volstead Law

Pasadena chamber of commerce has often been asked to help repeal the Volstead act. The latest proposal of this sort was from the Streator (Illinois) Chamber of Commerce, asking the local chamber to go on record in favor of twelve per cent wine and four per cent beer, says the Pasadena (Cal.) Star-News. At a meeting of the board of directors, the committee to which this request had been referred recommended that it be refused and that the board go on record as favoring the Volstead law. This recommendation was adopted.

Woman Mayor a Terror to Bootleggers

Dr. Amy Kaukonen, the twenty-three-year-old mayor of Fairport, Ohio, has been creating quite a stir locally through her efforts to "clean up," with special emphasis on bootlegging and gambling. Much to the discomfiture of the lawless element, who imagined they would have little to fear from a mere slip of a girl, she is living up to her pre-election pledge to make Fairport as spotless a town as lay in her power, and has already established herself as a forceful executive, with little mercy for law violators.

Dr. Kaukonen, who is of Hungarian parentage, is the youngest graduate of the Women's Medical College of Pennsylvania. Upon her election to the chief executive's office she calmly appointed herself to several other offices, so that as chief of police she arrests bootleggers; as expert chemist she analyzes, and as a board of health she pronounces against the liquor taken in the raids.

California's Governor Champions Wright Prohibition Bill

Speaking recently before an audience of 2,000 people in the high school auditorium at San Jose, California, Governor William D. Stephens, in officially launching the campaign in behalf of the Wright state prohibition amendment, boldly championed the bill, according to press reports, and declared the issue not one of wet or dry but of law as opposed to lawlessness, the Constitution of the United States versus the bootlegger. The governor expressed his belief that the prohibition movement is increasing rather than declining in strength.

Clean Plays a Good Business Investment Says Motion Picture Distributor

Arthur S. Kane, president of the Associated Exhibitors, a motion picture distributors' organization, has taken an unequivocal stand for clean plays. In explaining his position to independent producers, and emphasizing his own preference for wholesome films, he says:

"The productions having greatest entertainment value are those whose moral effect is unquestioned, hence in confining ourselves to this type we are influenced by our business sense as well as our natural inclinations."

Pacific Grove Passes Ordinance Strengthening Volstead Act

The city council of Pacific Grove, California, is the latest of the many cities and towns of the state to go on record for observance of law. By unanimous vote, according to the press, an ordinance was passed, backing up the provisions of the Volstead act, thus empowering local officials the better to enforce prohibitory measures.

Sweden to Vote on Prohibition in Autumn

It is reported that both the upper and lower chambers of the Swedish parliament have ratified a bill in favor of a consultative referendum on prohibition in the autumn.

Commander Booth Objects to Wet Chairman in Salvation Army Drive

When Commander Evangeline Booth of the Salvation Army learned that James Speyer, international banker, and chairman of the Salvation Army drive for $500,000, was also an officer of the New York division of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, she told him, according to the Chicago Herald Examiner, that he would have to resign one of these positions—that he could not remain at the head of the drive unless he ceased his activities in favor of liquor. He has, accordingly, resigned his place as chairman.

Do Something For Your Town Each Day

In a recent address made in Philadelphia, James M. Beck, United States solicitor general, lauded the example of Benjamin Franklin, who did something each day for his city, as a guide for modern citizens. "The overvaluation of the ballot as a political weapon is far less effective than what each man and woman can accomplish 365 days in the year by doing something good each day for their city," said Mr. Beck, as quoted in the Philadelphia North American. "When a citizen places his ballot in the box nowadays, he considers his duty done."

Episcopal Bishops Endorse Prohibition

The fact that occasionally a clergyman attacks the dry law does not prove that this is the sentiment among churchmen generally. The Bishop of London, speaking recently in that city, declared that he had the assurance of fifty-two bishops in America that prohibition is much to be preferred to license.

Governmental Summary is Favorable to Prohibition

While the enemies of prohibition persistently contend that more liquor is being consumed now than in license days, thinking people realize that if this allegation were true bootleggers could not ask such exorbitant prices for their product. According to the laws governing demand and supply, any commodity that is plentiful fails to command a top notch price. Moreover, when we stop to consider that only those who are confirmed drinkers are willing to risk their lives on the stuff which they must purchase secretly and which is apt to be mixed with the rankest poisons, it is self-evident that drinking must be on the decrease. But statistics are more convincing than any arguments which may be brought forth, and according to the following governmental summary, quoted from The American Issue, the per capita consumption of intoxicants increased under regulation and has been reduced to a minimum under prohibition, an irrefutable testimony to its efficiency:

"Source: The production of domestic wines prior to 1918 has been estimated by the Department of Agriculture, by Mr. J. W. Schoff of Bonfort's Wine and Spirit Circular, Inc., New York, and other well informed persons, and figures relate to the calendar year. The production of domestic spirits and malt liquors has been derived from the reports of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, as has also that of wine after 1917, the figures relating to the fiscal year. The table does not include for any year withdrawals of distilled spirits for scientific purposes and for use of the United States, nor since 1906 withdrawals for denaturization free of tax. For 1920 these amounts were 878,003 tax gallons and 45,640,949 proof gallons respectively.

"The first column of the subjoined table gives the year, the second column gives the per capita consumption of alcoholic liquors in gallons, the third column gives the number of states dry at the close of the period:

Year	Per Capita	No. States
1891-1895	16.96	3
1896-1900	17.01	3
1901-1905	19.20	3

PITFALLS TO BE AVOIDED IN SEX EDUCATION

Martha I. Falconer, Associate Director, Department of Social Morality, National W. C. T. U.

In planning social morality work, state superintendents and local chairmen should take into consideration the different kinds of groups that go to make up a community or a state. Just as in a city we have residential sections, business sections, and various other sections, so in the state we find farming sections, large industrial centers, and small towns and villages where each house shelters an individual family and the young people who work live at home. In the latter case the life of the individual centers around the home, amusements are planned there, acquaintances become known to the parents, and the kind of movies that are seen and the books that are read are discussed at home. When the girl lives in this environment, or in the strictly residential section of a larger town, or on a farm where conditions are much the same, it is not wise to emphasize the sordidness and dangers of prostitution, nor to force upon her knowledge of the facts and effects of disease. She should be taught the scientific truths regarding sex and, in connection with general health instruction, the proper precautions that should be observed to avoid contagion, making it clear that nearly all diseases are communicable and that many, tuberculosis, for instance, may be given when even the giver is unaware of his own condition; but at all times the emphasis should be placed upon health and not upon disease for, contrary to general opinion, young people are inclined to take the problems of life too seriously and what we regard as simply words of warning may create in their minds a feeling of fear of all comparative strangers and even of friends. This is an abnormal condition of mind which should be guarded against.

For the Home Girl

For the home girl a book such as "For Girls and the Mothers of Girls," which may be given her at twelve years of age, is all she needs in the way of scientific teaching, in addition, of course, to that she receives verbally from her mother, teacher, physical instructor, or from an authorized lecturer. There are leaflets which she may read with safety, after having acquired a little scientific knowledge, because nearly all leaflets are general in tone and are intended to present high ideals of social life rather than real sex education. For the girl of this type even an excellent pamphlet on sex education such as "Healthy, Happy Womanhood" is not intended until she is a little older, but "Our Ally, Mrs. Grundy," will give her an understanding of some of the conventions of everyday life which she is apt to resent when reminded of them too often by the older members of the family, regarding their views as old-fashioned. She does not realize, because she has never been told, that the higher standard of morals is a product of a progressive age rather than an evidence that one is mid-Victorian. If the adolescent girl reads "Healthy, Happy Womanhood," help her to understand it, but do not force it upon her attention.

But the girl whose early life has not been carefully guarded, or who leaves school early to go to work in some large industrial plant where she comes in daily contact with people of both sexes of different ages, and possibly of a variety of nationalities whose standards, of conversation, at least, are not the same as ours, needs, in addition to the usual sex instruction, just such a pamphlet as "Healthy, Happy Womanhood," or some similar one prepared by the State Department of Health or the U. S. Public Health Service. However, there is none any better than the one just named, as that gives the young girl the knowledge needed to protect her from the contamination of evil companionship.

For the Girl in Industry

The state does not intend to provide sex instruction to take the place of that which should be acquired at home, but only to furnish it where none has been given or to counteract the effect of evil information already received. We visit an orphan asylum and say, "If I had to leave my children alone in the world I would be glad to know that they were in a place as clean, wholesome, and sanitary as this and under the care of such a noble woman"; but we do not say, "I am going to close my home and send my children to the asylum where they will receive better care and training than I can give them." So it is with the sex education given by the state through the distribution of free pamphlets and leaflets. It is largely intended for the great masses of young people who are not being properly instructed at home and who, in consequence, learn much of evil. We cannot take away from them the knowledge they have acquired but we can counteract its bad effects by telling them about the normal sex life of the individual, and by giving them truthful and unexaggerated explanations about the evil they have met or will meet, and a clean vocabulary to use in discussing these facts with members of their own family and their own sex. While these young girls and young women in industry need just the same sex instruction that the sheltered home girl needs, they should be given, in addition, a clear explanation of what is meant by the single standard of morals and why this standard is necessary for the welfare of the individual, as well as for the welfare of the race.

How many of us know the difference between petit and grand larceny, or what the penalty would be if we were convicted of having stolen ten dollars? Yet most of us are honest because we were early taught the law of mine and thine. We say to the baby, "That is sister's book; this is baby's," and baby soon learns to respect his sister's possessions and to defend his own most vigorously; yet how old is he before he learns the meaning of the word, honest, or applies it to his own actions? We would not for a moment consider leaving such training until the baby could be taught the exact definition of the word, honest, and the details of the punishment that follows a dishonest act. So with sex education we must begin by teaching the principles of right living and high thinking, and not by piling up the horrors of evil living for the inspection of innocent child minds.

First Tell the Beauties of Right Living

Sex instruction should be given verbally as the awakening consciousness demands explanation of the everyday facts of family life, but where this has not been furnished, or when the adolescent age is reached, we must remember that because the time has come when a child must learn more of the facts of life, literature dealing with the joys and beauties of right living must be given first, leaving that which tells of disasters to be provided later, or when really needed. We cannot be too careful in the use of this kind of literature. Because a book or pamphlet is considered good, and has the endorsement of highly regarded authorities, it is not necessarily good for everyone. One good book on sex hygiene, suited to the age of the individual, is all that anyone needs and that book must be one that deals with physiology, leaving pathology for teachers, lecturers and medical students. In dealing with the very young, we should keep to the beauties of life but these should not be expressed in language so vague that it is not understood. An air of mystery serves only to stimulate unhealthy curiosity. Facts are facts and can be presented in language that is clear and plain and at the same time beautiful, but the facts and the language must be suited to the age and needs of the individual.

What Can We Do to Further Law Enforcement?

In an address by Dr. Wilbur Colvin, vice-president of Cox College, on "Law Observance and Law Enforcement," which appeared in a recent issue of the Georgia Bulletin, the state W. C. T. U. paper, he reviews the prohibition situation and calls attention to the fact that "through propaganda of remarkable subtlety and shrewdness the masses of the people are being steadily deceived and decoyed as to the workings and results of the prohibition amendment and the enforcement regulations under it."

Commenting upon the pernicious activities of the wets, the growing disregard for law and other evils that threaten our government, Dr. Colvin asks, "What can we do?" and then proceeds to answer his own question:

"Give every help and encouragement to all officials who are for law enforcement, and turn out of office as quickly as possible any who seem to wish to be popular with the criminal class.

"Insist that prison terms and not fines be the penalty for violation of most laws, especially the prohibition laws. And the fee system for paying court officials should be utterly abolished.

"Arouse and instruct the people concerning the real condition of affairs as to disregard for law, and the certain consequences. And especially train the children in the way in which they should go. Train them—don't simply let them grow up. Weeds just grow up, but cotton and corn must be cultivated.

COMMANDER EVANGELINE BOOTH OF THE SALVATION ARMY SAYS ANSWERS TO QUESTIONNAIRE INDICATE DECREASED DRUNKENNESS, AND INCREASED PROSPERITY

Evangeline Booth, Commander of the Salvation Army in the United States, in a statement just issued, published in the New York Times, declares that since the enactment of the Volstead act drunkenness among the poor has almost entirely disappeared. The announcement, she said, was based on facts reported by secretaries of the Salvation Army in all parts of the country to whom she sent a questionnaire regarding their observations in Salvation Army headquarters, shelters and hotels.

"Our social secretaries replied that cases of drunkenness are now the exception among men who frequent our hostelries, shelters and industrial homes," the survey said.

"More than two million beds were supplied by the Salvation Army last year, and it is on these two million cases that our secretaries base their answers. In one hostelry it was reported that 120 men who have never been known to keep a dollar more than twenty-four hours now have bank accounts of considerable size. In another hotel twenty-five men of the sort who before prohibition could not keep a dime now have deposits ranging from $100 to $500. These are unusually bright instances, but everywhere the workers of the Salvation Army have found a marked increase in thrift and prosperity and a decrease in drunkenness."

"In refutation of the charge that drunkenness has increased since prohibition, Commander Booth cites the fact that the Salvation Army's annual 'Boozers' Day,' when drunken men and women were collected from the streets, fed, clothed and prayed with, has been abandoned and the day has been given over to entertaining the newsboys and poor youngsters of the city.

"Because prohibition has cleared our park benches of drunkards, we are able to entertain 5,000 boys under fourteen years old in New York City on this day, these boys being benefited because one of the greatest curses of humanity has been placed beyond the reach of men and women."

A CITY THAT REFUSED TO BE LABELED "WET"

Labeling certain cities as "pro wine and beer" seems to be one of the duties of the publicity department of the National Association Against Prohibition. An effort was made recently to brand the city of Evanston, Illinois, for many years the home of Frances E. Willard, and the seat of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union and the Northwestern University, as of the "wine and beer" class. In a circular letter sent to all legislative candidates it was asserted that a survey of Evanston had been made and it was found a large majority of the people were for a modification of the Volstead Code to permit the return of wine and beer. In certain newspapers the boast was made that seventy-five per cent of the business men of Evanston were with the antis and had promised to help them, and that Evanston was covered with moonshine stills.

Did Evanston submit quietly to this aspersion on her fair name? Indeed, she did not. From a time to which the memory of most Evanstonians runneth not to the contrary, theirs has been a dry city. Fathers and mothers from other states have sent their sons and daughters to the University confident that so far as the liquor traffic is concerned they would be in a zone of safety.

As soon as attention was called to the false statement of the antis, the telephone wires began to hum, as the story was discussed. "Majority of Evanston's citizens for wine and beer!" indignantly declared the mothers. "They certainly did not include the women of this town in their survey." "No, nor the churches," echoed the pastors.

The daily newspapers sent reporters to inquire as to the attitude of the leading business men, with the result that not one was found who would declare himself in favor of the aims of the anti-prohibition society. A report appeared in the evening paper. The men interviewed not only expressed their disapproval of the aims of the wine and beer society but without exception said they believed the claims made by it were false. A leading banker declared he was strictly in favor of the present prohibition law, "110 per cent in sympathy with the W. C. T. U." were his words.

The secretary of the chamber of commerce, speaking for the business men as a whole said: "The statement of the National Association Against Prohibition that 75 per cent of the business men of Evanston are backing it is untrue. There are very few business men who want to see liquor come back in any form. The light wines and beer issue is a subterfuge. It would be impossible to permit the sale of intoxicating liquor, and then say how intoxicating it might be to prove it legal or illegal. Even should a business man personally favor an occasional drink, he would be a rare specimen who would take upon himself the responsibility of casting his vote for a return of liquor."

"It is my estimate that an anti-prohibition movement would receive in Evanston less than five per cent support," said the chief of police. "The prohibition law is a good one; it should be rigidly enforced. The only moonshining in the city is in the extreme west borders in a little section inhabited by Polish people, and we are cleaning that out as fast as possible."

Chamber of Commerce Passes Strong Resolution

Resenting the charge made against Evanston, the chamber of commerce at the first meeting of the board of directors, passed the following strong resolution:

"Resolved, that the board of directors of the Evanston Chamber of Commerce views with concern the report that has gone abroad that the business men of Evanston do not favor the strict enforcement of laws making effective the provisions of the Eighteenth Amendment. We are very sure that the report is a gross misrepresentation.

"We heartily approve of the Eighteenth Amendment, favor the strict enforcement of its provisions and look with disfavor on suggestions of any modification of present laws that might make their enforcement more difficult. We believe this to represent the sentiment of a very large majority of the business men of Evanston."

When the matter came up in the Kiwanis Club, it was discovered that not one of the nearly sixty men present had been approached by the representative of the wine and beer interests in its pretended survey of the "business houses." So great was the interest of the members, who were unanimously in favor of the enforcement and retention of the present law, that prohibition and its benefits became a topic for open discussion, several eloquent extempore speeches were made, and the meeting was for the time being turned into a forum on the evils of the alcohol habit.

"They Didn't Believe It Themselves"

As a conclusion to the whole matter the News-Index of Evanston came out with a first page editorial on "They Didn't Believe It Themselves," saying, "The recent statement of the National Association Against Prohibition that 75 per cent of the business men of this city are favorable to the object of their organization is manifestly false, so false that the originator of the assertion could not possibly believe it himself. * * * * The people of this city recognize that one of the very greatest factors in the development of the unique conditions that exist here has been the law which prohibited the sale of alcohol. Every experience of the city has proved the good effect of prohibition and no Evanstonian who looks at facts can fail to recognize it. An evidence of the general public sentiment is the prompt repudiation by the chamber of commerce of the charge that has been made against the good citizenship of the city's business men."

If the unscrupulous tactics of the opponents of prohibition in other communities, have the effect produced in Evanston, namely, arousing public sentiment favorable to the dry law and stimulating it to outspoken expression through the press, their much advertised National Association Against Prohibition will increase in membership at a snail's pace.

133,413 Convicts Favor Prohibition—Only 909 Against It

According to E. E. Dudding, president of the Prisoner's Relief Society, a poll of convicts on their attitude toward national prohibition was taken recently in 322 penal institutions, resulting in a vote of 133,413 to 909 in favor of the Eighteenth Amendment. Mr. Dudding said the poll was taken at the request of a United States Senator.

INDUSTRY, DEMOCRACY AND EDUCATION

Laura Parks Miller, National Director Women in Industry

"We declare our purpose to educate the young."—W. C. T. U. Declaration of Principles, 1875.

"I did not go to school like many of you. I went to work when I was fourteen to help support my family. But as we grow older we do want a social education. We want to know the things the ordinary school does not tell us about. When I read ancient history and was told that Nebuchadnezzar (or whatever that fellow's name was), built the hanging gardens for the mistress he liked, I thought he was a wonderful man, such a chivalrous man, but now when I think of the number of slaves that built those gardens, I want to know what was the price those slaves paid for the caprice of one man and for the caprice of one woman. When we listen to soap box orators and to ordinary trade union organizers we become inspired. Our emotions are aroused and we say, 'Down with the boss and up with the workers.' But it does not get us anywhere. After a while, when all our enthusiasm is gone, when the curtain of illusion is torn from our eyes, we must have real knowledge in order to be able to keep up the bitter fight. We want education, the real kind, not the taffy, not the sugar coated stuff. We want the education in regard to the struggle of the worker and how to meet it in an intelligent and practical way."

Jennie Matyos, New York east side garment worker, thus explains the sort of education that more and more industrial workers are seeking. Scattered over the country are schools unlike any other schools. They are paid for, through labor unions, by working men and women, who, after the long day's work, come together for what Miss Matyos calls "the real kind of education." (1)

In 1921 was held the first national conference on workers' education. Miss Matyos was only one of many student speakers.

To Enlarge Souls, Not Machinery

Frank Fenton gave it as his opinion that, "We who are in the labor movement must be big and broad enough to realize that within our ranks lies a vast amount of ignorance. This ignorance amongst ourselves must be fought before we can successfully combat the active ignorance of unscrupulous employers. For ignorance is a disease that is death and darkness to the mind. Education is the timely stimulant that will effect a cure. Our future is a great adventure; an adventure we must prepare ourselves for. That does not simply mean to learn the ideals of today; we must train ourselves to make the ideals of tomorrow."

Sarah Shapiro believed that "the pupils liked our classes because they felt free to express themselves there.....I have learned a great deal in my course of economics.....We also had a class in literature from which I personally gained a great deal.....Instead of speaking in the shop of the customers or the tools, or the dresses that we make, we speak of literature. Instead of speaking of how the boss will try to get the best of us—we do think that sometimes—we speak of economics. Why is he gambling? Why is he slow in the factory? When we begin to know the reasons why and ask questions, I believe we will begin to solve problems. If we know why we have to work, why the doors of the colleges are closed to us, why we are limited to a certain time for our education and for our pleasure, and begin to ask those questions, I believe that this will do a great deal to bring about real social progress."

Do you notice that through all of these comments runs the thread of labor troubles, of the misunderstanding and suspicion that is typical today between the employer and the employee? It is because of the vital importance of our modern labor problems that industrial education of every sort is so important, and in the belief of your director, it is important particularly to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

When Schools Turned Anti-Booze

Fifty years of hammering into young minds one scientific fact, "Alcohol is a poison." Result, the constitutional amendment. Another generation to come, driving home the same fact. Then surely we shall have accomplished, in custom as in law, the once unbelievable. We shall have prohibition. Could we ever have it without education on that one fact: "Alcohol is a poison"?

Suppose that two or three generations ago some one had set out to teach another simple truth. Suppose, remembering always that ours is a democracy, our schools had declared, in season and out of season, "Honest labor is honorable."

Can Democracy Waste Life?

Do you think that 1921 would have seen four million involuntarily idle and at least as many more working on part time? (2) Do you think our schools would fall so far short of the average citizen's need, that out of every hundred children who start to school, only twenty-seven (as now) would willingly enter high school? (3) Do you think we should see a succession of strikes, lockouts, wage and hour controversies so bitter that courts, legislatures and troops on the one hand, and the lives of women and children on the other, have become mere pawns?

Do you think that—maybe—the average man's contentment would now be measured by industrial communities of citizens with the "dryest"—instead of the "wettest"—sentiment in America?

Public Schools and Priests

The world once consisted of priests, nobility and "common people." The common people were "free" only to work where and as they were told by their "betters". Or they were slaves and serfs without any freedom. Labor was a badge of inferiority. The European parents of our schools were born then. Your public school and mine still teach subjects wanted by the long dead priests. They teach in the way the bookish boy learns.

Gradually, schools have had ideas like our S. T. I. truths forced into them. Many W. C. T. U. folk know from long experience how much and how steady the forcing must be!

Now for some questions.

Doesn't being a good citizen (for the vast majority of men and for one woman out of four) mean spending half one's waking time in earning? Do the schools teach this sort of citizenship? Here are a few answers. The rest you'd better discover in your own community.

Twenty thousand fathers of growing boys ought to be 20,000 good citizens. Think of these 20,000 fathers as providers, as earners:

	No.	Pct.
In service—government, professional (the modern equivalents of priests' and nobles' jobs) plus domestic and personal...	2500	12½
In mining, etc.	700	3½
In manufacturing and building	10300	51½
In transportation	2600	13
In trade	3900	19½

(4)

A few are employers. Most are employees. All of them practically have to work in relation to others' wants and capacities and understanding.

How Does Your School Use Your Taxes?

Does your public school teach employer-employee relationships? Does it even give some job-training in anything like the proportions above? It does not! I don't have to know where you live to know that your high school surely teaches Latin for the fraction of 12 per cent that will need it. But there's scarcely one chance in a hundred that either grade or high school teaches industrial relations—that "Honest labor is honorable"—or that it teaches building and manufacturing facts to the more than 50 per cent that will need them. And what happens? Boys drop back in their grades as the only protest they can make. Then they drop out. Take these very fathers' boys. If they lived in Aurora, Illinois, 27 per cent of the thirteen-year-old boys were lagging behind their grade. But in Bridgeport Connecticut; Birmingham, Alabama Lansing, Michigan; and Portsmouth Virginia, 80 per cent or more were behind. Change the schools, not the boys

Now about the girls? "No denial of trade education will keep a girl out of a trade, and if she is denied entrance by the front door as a skilled, trained artisan, she will enter by the back door as an under-bidder." (4) An under-bidder is, of course, a worker who is so new to the trade that he or she will take a wage less than seasoned employees agree to work for. The girl and the immigrant, often through ignorance, puts wages below the level on which a man can support a family.

Of fifty girls taken in a raid at a San Francisco dance hall last summer, only three had any vocational training. The untrained young worker is the one who drifts morally.

WHAT THE W. C. T. U. STANDS FOR

Superlative achievement in the past, splendid success in the present, and SPECIAL SERVICE in the years to come.

S- ACRIFICE. Yes, it often means sacrifice, but if, as Frances E. Willard said, "Mother-hearted women are called to be the saviors of the race," is it not worth while to make a sacrifice, if thereby we have our part in such a glorious destiny?

E- DUCATION. During the critical months ahead, all the influence of womanhood should be concentrated upon strengthening sentiment for law enforcement and inculcating the highest ideals of Christian citizenship, through education.

R- ESPONSIBILITY. The resources of the W. C. T. U. are used extensively in meeting its responsibility towards all who need help—the new American and others, but particularly the child, the hope of the world. For, as Phillips Brooks reminds us: "He who helps a child helps humanity with a distinctness, with an immediateness, which no other help given human creatures in any other stage of their human life can possibly give again."

V- ALUABLE LEADERSHIP. Every community needs consecrated leadership. Often evil seems to prevail because there are many who are willing to lead people astray, while those who should be leaders for righteousness hesitate, and wait for others to volunteer. Many women who are successful in various lines of work gratefully attribute much of their success to training received in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

I- NVESTMENT OF PERSONALITY where the returns are the surest. Whether a leader, or worker in the rank and file, there is need for the influence each can exert. Just as the spring becomes the rivulet, the brook, and then the broad river sweeping toward the sea, so, if we can influence but one, that one may reach a thousand more. The "magic of the human touch," when used by God, can work miracles. What sort of personality have you? Invest it!

C- O-OPERATION with the best people who are striving for the same end. During the war, the men on their cross-country marches went sometimes in regular formation, sometimes in single file, either way covering the same amount of territory. "But," said one of the men afterwards, "you wouldn't believe how much more tired we were after one of the single-file marches than after the shoulder-to-shoulder one." Why lose the stimulus of comradeship and personal contact by missing the opportunity to become a member of the W. C. T. U.?

E- DUCATED ENTHUSIASM. A boy in a gymnasium was practicing the pole vault and failing every time. The coach watched him, saw that he wasn't putting enough will power into his efforts, and thundered out: "Rollins, throw your heart over the bar, and your body will follow!" The lad, startled, took the hint and instantly cleared the bar by several inches. The W. C. T. U. has been successful in the past, because it has put HEART into its efforts.

All that the W. C. T. U. stands for, the aim of the twenty-four departments of work, may be summed up in the one word—SERVICE. "I serve," the motto, it is said, of the royal family of England, is also ours, who are of the family of the King of Kings.

World's W. C. T. U. Worker Returns Home

When the steamer "Pan American" docked at the Hoboken, (N. J.) pier last week Monday, a group of W. C. T. U. and Y. P. B. comrades were there to meet and greet Miss Muriel Ayres, World's W. C. T. U. organizer, returning from South America. Because of a very serious illness a month or two ago, Miss Ayres has been compelled to give up her work in Argentina and return to the homeland for a long period of rest. Exceptionally fine service has been rendered by Miss Ayres among the young people of both Uruguay and Argentina, by whom she is greatly beloved, and to whom she has carried the "victory spirit" and tested methods of the Young People's Branch of America.

We regret that the pictures which appear on the cover page this week did not reach us in time to be used as illustrations for Miss Anna Gordon's article (published in our issue of March 30) relative to the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Pachuca, where she presented the work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

From the maguey plants, shown in the lower picture, exudes a thick, milky, sweet liquid used to make "pulque." Cloth, ropes and strings are also manufactured from the fiber. Though a very destructive plant, it is, at the same time, a very useful one, furnishing the Indian material for a receptacle in which to carry his possessions to market. Alas, it also provides him with the poison that makes him stagger homeward with nothing to show from the sale of his produce.

WORLD'S W. C. T. U. CONVENTION, PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA, NOVEMBER 11-16, 1922
NATIONAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION, ATLANTIC CITY, NEW JERSEY, NOVEMBER 18-23, 1922

Congratulations to Mr. Hays!

A great victory for moral cleanliness was scored when at the request of Mr. Will H. Hays, head of the moving picture organizations, the producers and distributors of the "Fatty" Arbuckle pictures canceled the 10,000 showings of these films. The press states that this will mean a loss to the cinema industry of from one to two million dollars. It will mean a gain to good morals in the recreational life of the nation far greater than can be estimated in figures. Mr. Hays is reported to have explained his action by calling attention to the charter of the cinema organizations, giving as their purpose: "To attain and maintain the highest moral and artistic standards." In holding the producers and distributors to this high standard, Mr. Hays ought to have the hearty support of all clean-minded people.

Salvation Army's Commendable Consistency

No social welfare organization has been more outspoken against the liquor traffic and the disastrous effect of alcohol upon human health and happiness than has the Salvation Army. It therefore was a foregone conclusion that Evangeline Booth, the commander of the Army in the United States, should ask James Speyer to resign from the chairmanship of the Army's $500,000 drive when she learned that he had accepted office in the National Association Against the Prohibition Amendment.

"We may lose millions of dollars from former supporters," she is reported to have said," but if that penalty is visited upon us I have every faith to believe that other thousands of people who believe in what we are doing will rally to our support."

Miss Booth and the Army are to be congratulated upon the courageous stand they have taken in refusing to have their organization linked up in any way with the movement against national prohibition.

The Minus Millions

If 27,000,000 intelligent men and women should awaken some morning to find themselves disfranchised by an act of Congress, the vocabulary of the English language would be quite inadequate to express their indignation over such injustice. Yet we are told in a bulletin recently issued by the Census Bureau in Washington that the aggregate vote cast on presidential election day in 1920 for all candidates was 26,657,866 out of 54,426,832 eligible votes, leaving the enormous total of 27,768,966 as the non-voting population. Unquestionably this non-voting faction is among the most powerful allies of corrupt politicians, and one on which they definitely reckon to gain their victories. Cases innumerable can be cited where a moral issue was defeated at the polls as the direct result of civic "sins of omission" on the part of men and women, members of our churches. The law-abiding and at heart patriotic people, by sitting at home at their ease on primary and election day, give aid to the pro-liquor interests as surely as if they went to the polls and cast their ballots against prohibition.

What shall it profit us to have secured the Nineteenth Amendment to the Constitution if the women of our land fail to make wise and conscientious use of their franchise privileges? We must educate them to a keen consciousness of their civic duties.

The Million Members drive of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is primarily a campaign to arouse the sleeping consciences of the women voters, to instill in them a sense of responsibility as citizens, and to persuade them to unite with other women of like purpose to enforce and hold the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Code.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of every town should card catalogue the women of its community, make certain that every individual is given a chance to become intelligent on her duties as a voter and the merits of the present issues, and see that she is invited to join the W. C. T. U., thus lining up with the anti-alcohol forces. The first invitation should be followed up by letters, telephone calls, and literature until she comes to a realization of her obligation as a voting citizen and unites with us.

New Ways of Using It

A moving picture comedian was recently quoted by the press as saying "After all, there are fundamentally only a few jokes, just as there are few plots What the comedian and novelist must strive for is new ways of using the old stuff."

The housewife is apt to wish that she had new materials with which to prepare appetizing meals, but she remembers that while the family may grow weary of a dish served repeatedly, the same ingredients, dressed up in new style, will arouse the appetite and thus do more toward preserving the health.

The same general principle is true concerning the education of public sentiment along the line of prohibition and law enforcement. To say "prohibition is good for the home" is to state a fact, but that slogan has been so often repeated that it does not have upon hearer or reader the good effect that would follow, for instance, a description of some particular town where the slums have been transformed into good residence districts, or of some school where the children are now doing better work because the saloons which formerly held sway in the neighborhood are gone, or of some moral court where, since the coming of prohibition, fewer boys have been brought to trial.

It is said, "prohibition has closed jails." But will this mere statement ceive the ready credence or secure the converts to the prohibitory law that would greet the story of the Marion county workhouse at Indianapolis, idle and vacant for more than two years now, although formerly filled to its capacity of several hundred; or the statement that in Birmingham, Alabama, crime has been reduced fifty per cent, evidenced by the fact that the jail built in that city to house one-hundred-fifty prisoners, at a cost of $100,000, is now being used by the Juvenile Court as a receiving home and parental school.

Such facts as have been stated are valuable as educational propaganda. Every empty jail means a reduction of taxes—an argument which is bound to have weight. But there is a still better way to arrest the attention of the honest doubter; namely, to search for and use all available data which has to do with conditions in your immediate vicinity. A definite effort to gain facts will repay a thousand-fold. Use them in the W. C. T. U. column in your town paper; see that they happen(?) to crop out in your conversation; use them in the meetings of your union, your missionary society, your club. They cannot be gainsaid, for the evidence is easy to verify.

Find a new way of using these facts. Why not advertise an "experience meeting" for your union? Each member should be ready with specific, concrete facts, showing the value of prohibition, that it can be enforced, and that the more strictly it is enforced, the better will it pay. Names, dates, places, and figures should be given. If such facts can be gleaned from local conditions, so much the better. If not, use those found in THE UNION SIGNAL or elsewhere. Be sure to be well prepared, and you might invite a reporter to be present! The result of such a meeting would mean new encouragement in the fight against the enemy and new adherents to the cause.

"'Dry' Law's Here to Stay," Says Seattle Daily Times

The Seattle Daily Times, one of the most widely read and influential papers on the west coast, was formerly not in favor of prohibition and fought the proposition with its full power clear to the bitter end. However, having seen the effects of prohibition and studied the question from various angles, the Times declares that "Prohibition's here to stay, no matter how some may rage against it." In a leading editorial of recent date the Times voices its convictions in the following terse and telling language:

"A new association has been formed which proposes to 'get the Volstead act repealed, to permit every state to pass its own enforcement act, to then remove the prohibition amendment from the Constitution.'

"To borrow a phrase from the slang of the day, 'that's some contract.'

"If the organization confined itself solely to repeal of the Volstead act, it would be mapping out for itself a fight that probably would last as long as the patience or the purse of those who might be willing to back it.

"It has indicated a program which, if consistently pursued, might be accomplished in a couple of generations, always provided the sentiment of the minority that opposed prohibition remained as it is now—which, of course, will not be the case.

"Efforts to repeal the Volstead act, to say nothing of the prohibition amendment, are about as vain as anything that may be imagined. The fact is that foes of this policy are facing an accomplished fact, just as the South faced an accomplished fact when slavery was abolished in the United States.

"Already, the country's destiny is partially in the hands of a body of voters who have reached maturity under prohibition or partial prohibition. The men of less than twenty-five who have spent all their lives in communities where saloons were permitted are few by comparison with those who were reared in 'dry' or partially 'dry' territory.

"The association mentioned above, with its pretentious program, appeals only to a small part of the electorate—and most of that composed of men nearly or past middle age. Before it could get Congress to do anything, those who would be setting the pace, in Washington as elsewhere, would be individuals who had grown up under prohibition and had come to accept it as the settled order of things.

"Prohibition's here to stay, no matter how some may rage against it. Moreover, it's going to be observed much more generally in future, not so much because of rigid enforcement as because the demand for intoxicants will diminish.

"The 'dry' leaders who regard the craze for home brew with calm tolerance are wiser students of human nature than the 'antis,' who really think they can repeal the prohibition amendment."

Time of Prayer—Noontide

"It is always noontide somewhere,
And across the awakening continents,
From shore to shore, somewhere,
Our prayers are rising ever more."

The Mexican Night

The Mexican night sky bent lovingly over the open school-patio—and somehow the Mexican night sky seems a bit more akin to the sky beneath which there were shepherds keeping watch over their flocks, than does the northern sky. The patio was filled with children, a dark tree stood in the midst, a hush of expectancy was over all. And then a child's voice, thin and clear, was heard reciting one of the majestic prophecies of the Old Testament. A tiny point of light pierced the darkness and the first candle was lighted on the Christmas tree. Another prophecy, another point of light. Finally, verse by verse, the entire Christmas story was told, and, tiny flame by tiny flame, the tree became a burst of light, a torch in the darkness. Here and there a song fitted in as naturally as if it were a blossom on the tree itself—"The First Noel," "Nazareth," "Holy Night"—the poignantly sweet child voices carried the exquisite notes high above our heads. And here and there, too, a living picture—the shepherds, the wise men, the young mother—all beautifully conceived and reverently executed. It was Christmas Eve, and under the charm of the Guadalajara sky one almost heard the brush of wings, the song of the stars, and the harmony of angels praising God and saying, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace among men."

Wisconsin Conference a Winner

Special Correspondence

The Wisconsin institute at Madison was so grand a success (leaving nothing to be desired) that the wish was expressed that our ten thousand members might have been there to enjoy it with us. The day was ideal, the magnificent assembly chamber, breathing an exhilarating atmosphere of achievement, provided an ideal setting, and the attendance was excellent, over thirty unions being represented. One hundred and thirty-four white ribboners registered, and there were probably many who did not. One hundred guests sat down at a large, beautifully decorated table in the capitol dining-hall. It was an inspiring sight.

Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger, national director of Americanization, was at her best and delighted her listeners, while Mrs. Laura Parks Miller, national director of Women in Industry, thrilled the audience with her burning message. Mrs. Annie W. Warren, vice-president of Wisconsin, presided and all pronounced the occasion a delightful and inspiring one.

Tennessee's Fine Conferences

Amanda Neal Wheelock, Corresponding Secretary

Tennessee is rejoicing over its successful district conferences. Memphis, Nashville and Chattanooga have successively been most gracious and hospitable hostesses to these very much enjoyed and highly beneficial meetings.

At Nashville, Mrs. Frances P. Parks, national corresponding secretary, and Mrs. Maude B. Perkins, national Y. P. B. secretary, two ladies who will always find Tennessee's latch-string on the outside for them, contributed their genial presences and the quota of their knowledge and experience in the planning for the successful broadening and extension of the work, especially through the million members campaign.

Chattanooga had Mrs. Gilreath and Miss Shaner, a valiant host; also Dr. John R. Neal, professor of law in the University of Tennessee, who made an address on "Law Enforcement" along the lines that will be helpful to the women in their work to make effective the laws on prohibition, and public morality and safety. Mrs. Minnie Allison Welch, our beloved and capable president, is carrying out, with all her powers of soul, mind and body, the plans of the national officers. She presided at all of the district conferences and has all the reins of her office well in hand. Under her guiding efficiency, Tennessee is going to perform her part in the membership drive as loyally as she went over the top in the Jubilee Fund Campaign.

Stickers

If the efforts of reformers are to be successful, their work must not be done spasmodically in the enthusiasm of the moment. The destructive forces are working twenty-four hours per day, three hundred and sixty-five days per annum. The reformers must become "stickers" to their job. The committee for the World's W. C. T. U. convention have discovered a method by which every temperance worker may become a twenty-four hour worker for the cause. Just enclose $3.00 for a thousand or 50 cents for a hundred and say "Stickers," to

Rallying Song

Tune: "Battle Hymn of the Republic."

We're marching through the valley now,
Up toward yon mountain height,
Where soon our banner's folds shall wave,
Reflecting God's own light;
We know that we shall conquer,
For He's with us in the fight,
And victory shall be ours.

They're thronging to our ranks today,
The brave, the true, the strong,
The men who strive by voice and vote,
To overthrow the wrong;
And woman's voice with ours is raised
In pleading prayer and song,
That victory may be ours.

Lift up your hearts, discouraged ones,
The battle's not your own;
The arm on which you lean today,
Has never weaker grown.
The Captain who is leading us
Defeat has never known,
And victory shall be ours.

What though before us rise the walls
That Satan's hosts defend!
What though we meet with enemies
Where we had looked for friends!
A coward heart alone would flee,
While God His aid still lends,
For victory shall be ours.

Then fling our banner to the breeze,
And shout our rallying cry,
For God and Home and Native Land
We still will dare or die;
With faith and hope and love we'll raise
Our glorious standard high,
And victory shall be ours.

And when the battle's won we'll stand
Upon yon mountain height,
Beneath the flag whose spotless folds
Reflect the new-born light;
We'll sing as sing the ransomed ones,
Whose faith is lost in sight,
The victory is ours.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

Iowa Young People Meet In Stirring Convention

Iowa's second annual Y. P. B. convention, with an increased registration, was enjoyable and profitable. It was held at Humeston, March 31-April 2, and the local Branch, under the efficient leadership of Mrs. Gretta Gray, had made particularly fine preparations. The music included the high school orchestra with special songs. The supper the first evening was served by the Humeston W. C. T. U.—a much appreciated evidence of their interest in the Y. P. B. After the opening meeting, with music, welcomes, responses and greetings from absent workers, "getting acquainted games" were played, closing with a prohibition questionnaire. Miss Sadie Markee, state superintendent of Medal Contests, gave a number of delightful readings. The department was added to the state Y. P. B. program for next year.

As the roll was called, the location of branches was indicated by placing stars on a map of Iowa. The report showed very good work done. Mrs. Lindberg of Stanton has promised to have a large muslin map of Iowa made for use next year.

Two essays on "Health—Life's Greatest Asset" were read before the convention. The one given highest rank by the judges is to be sent in to compete for the prize offered by the national department of Health. A goodly number of anti-narcotic posters were displayed and one was selected to be entered in the national department contest. Six Y. P. B. members were reported as having completed the study courses and were awarded certificates.

A debate and a mosaic of two-minute speeches, full of life and interest, were features of the Saturday evening meeting. Mention should be made of Mrs. Chilcott's masterly presentation of the financial needs of our work. One life membership was pledged by the Oskaloosa Y. P. B. for Wilbur Williams, the son of Mrs. Jessie Williams, a former Y. P. B. secretary. The presence of Mrs. Fannie A. Drummond, national field secretary, was much appreciated. The large Sabbath congregations were addressed by Mrs. Drummond and by Miss Edith E. Smith, Y. P. B. secretary for Iowa.

College Students Ban Drinking

The student council at William and Mary College, Williamsburg, Virginia, has "banned drinking," according to the Philadelphia North American, "voting to expel any man found under the influence of liquor after he has once been warned. The decision was made public in the Flat Hat, the official college publication.

"'The council,' the article says, 'has decided to take stringent action in all cases of drinking. Ignorance of this rule is no excuse. It is not the desire of the council to expel any man, but sentiment is against drinking, and it will be entirely prohibited.'"

"The moral fiber of our national life is given strength and tone, and civilization itself is materially benefited by the great work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union in its Young People's Branch," writes Dr. G. F. Winfield, president of Wesley College of Greenville, Texas, and also president of the American Association of Junior Colleges.

Hints For Study Course

It is easier to give time to the Y. P. B. study course during these spring months than in June, when the school year is closing.

Make the study course a mental sport; not a grind. Some find it good fun to divide the Branch into teams and one side ask the questions at one meeting and answer them the next.

It is worth one's while to know something about our government. It is equally worth while to form the habit of doing a little serious reading outside of one's school work. Study is one of the "paths of progress."

Lincoln studied his law books by himself. At that time only a few, like the lawyer, the preacher, and the teacher, studied to prepare themselves for their work. Today there are greater opportunities. Let us avail ourselves of them.

—Prof. Harry Guthmann.

Don't Forget our Y. P. B. Slogan: 5,000 New Members, 500 New Branches, and 500,000 Signatures to the Polyglot Petition.

Significant Sayings of Present Day Statesmen and Educators

"The conscience of America has triumphed in the adoption of prohibition. The appetite of America will not overthrow it," declared Hon. William Jennings Bryan, in an address the other day.

Dr. Marion Burton, president of the Michigan University, and former president of Smith College and the Minnesota state University, expressed himself forcefully on the necessity of law observance, when he said in an address, "We must train a generation of young people who have profound respect for law and order and the Constitution. The day is past when we can joke about the Eighteenth Amendment."

"Everybody is ready to sustain the law he likes. That is not in the proper sense respect for law or order. The test of respect for law is where the law is upheld even though it hurts," says Charles E. Hughes, Secretary of State.

"One who, in the matter of national prohibition, holds his personal opinion and his claim of personal liberty to be of higher sanction than this overwhelming constitutional expression of the people is a disciple of practical Bolshevism," declares William Howard Taft, Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court.

Marshal Joffre, the French hero of the Marne, was the honor guest at a banquet the other day at the Blackstone Hotel, Chicago. The Chicago Herald-Examiner, in its story of the event, says, "After voicing his appreciation of the welcome accorded him, Marshal Joffre concluded: 'Permit me to raise my glass in a toast to America—and to one of her priceless jewels, the City of Chicago!' And with that the assemblage arose, the marshal placed a glass to his lips and quaffed a magnum of Lake Michigan's straightest chlorine solution."

A PRESIDENTIAL MESSAGE TO YOUNG PEOPLE

President Warren G. Harding at the commencement exercises of the American University, spoke as follows of the conditions and needs of our times:

"You of the next generation of leadership will live in a time of readjustment and reorganization.....It is a commonplace that at this time the world stands on the brink of what looks much like a precipice.....Humanity is seeking, as it never sought before, for those who can see widely, clearly, fearlessly; who will be capable of determining what is sound and what is right, and courageous enough to stand for it, though they stand alone..... Therefore, I implore a dedication to common service, to human betterment, to civilization's advancement, on the part of these young people who at least must so largely direct the affairs of country and of society in the hard but very hopeful times which lie ahead."

That for which the President pleads is intelligent, highly trained and truly Christian leadership, for it is only the Christian spirit which prompts to devotion to the service of mankind.

The Young People's Branch of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union seeks to produce that type of leader to which the President refers.

The man who drinks whisky may not be a fool, but he is foolish, and if he keeps it up he will be a fool, and in not a very long time, either. The man who sells it deserves to have the finger of shame forever pointing at him, for there is no earthly excuse for his doing it, except the very poor excuse that he is willing to pander to the vilest part of his fellow man's nature for a cash consideration.—Richmond (Calif.) Record-Herald.

Damage to Life Cells From Alcohol

Cora F. Stoddard

The discovery of the microscope put an instrument in the hands of nature students by which they could see and study the minute living cells that make up the bodies of plants and animals. It enabled them to trace separate parts in the cell and to see it grow and multiply.

Among the cells that carry on the various kinds of work in living bodies, such as muscle cells, nerve cells, gland cells, is found one class of cells whose special work is the production of new life like that of the parents. Scientists call these cells by special names, such as germ cells and reproductive cells. Some have called them "life" cells, because they are the beginning of new life.

Recently a study of the effect of alcohol on the life cells of rats was made by Dr. Kostitch of the University of Strasburg. He gave alcohol to live rats in quantities sufficient to correspond with amounts that produce drunkenness in man. After several days the rats were killed and their life cells, still living, were placed under the microscope and examined.

Rats that had received no alcohol were also killed and their life cells examined.

The report states that the cells from the alcoholized rats showed signs of disintegration not found in those from the normal rats. Not all parts of the cells showed injuries at the same time, but always the nucleus, the most important part, was the first to show signs of damage.

The most common form of injury was the appearance of a "vacuole" or cavity from which the true cell substance had disappeared. The vacuole gradually enlarged until it filled the whole space formerly occupied by the nucleus. In this condition the cell could never produce new cells.

This change occurred in cells that were "resting," that is, were not yet ready to start the process of cell division that would lead to new cells.

Life cells that had begun the process of division were differently affected. In some the new cells divided unequally, instead of symmetrically as in the normal state. In others there was inequality in the time taken for the changes, one part of the cell completing its change before the other part.

In some cells the process of division was entirely stopped, that is, the cell died at the very beginning of its attempt to form new lives.

This evidence of the injury caused by alcohol to the cells from which new life springs adds another link in the chain of evidence showing that the use of alcohol by parents may be responsible for mental or physical defects in their children.

Booze Raiders Find Evidence That They Are in Wrong House

"Beat it boys, there's nothing here." The dry squad of Seattle, Wash., had just unlimbered for action. Closets were being searched, bureau drawers rummaged, rugs taken up to disclose possible holes in the floor and walls sounded for hidden caches. The unwonted noise came from a husky raider. Work suspended at once and there was a gathering of the clan in the kitchen where an object on a spotlessly clean table was spoiling the evening's pleasure. And the evening had started out so auspiciously, for two trips had already been made to the police station with captured booze and a "hop" smoking outfit, and the bunch had just come from raiding a combination booze and gambling joint to the strains of a pipe organ in an adjoining church, and the raiders were feeling chesty. As one man fingered the leaves gingerly, he wanted to know who had given the "bum steer." Another in emphatic language thought it was a shame that decent folks should ever have been permitted to move into a house with the reputation this one had. Everybody went back and straightened up any muss he had made. One man was wrestling with a bed coverlet trying to smooth it out. Just to stop the flow of language I helped him. Don't get the idea that I am an expert bedmaker, but I had an experience in Camp Lewis during the war that came in handy just then. When I was a "Y" man there the top sergeant who presided over the barracks where I slept didn't like the way I made up my bunk, so he tore it up three times in succession before I remade it to suit him.

The innocent cause of the sudden stop in the raid was a dog-eared, open Bible.

Now, I suppose, some bootlegger will try an investment in a Bible. But he will not get by unless he creates the necessary "atmosphere." The kitchen must be spotlessly clean, also the stove and the whole house. There must be no accumulation of cigaret stubs, or greasy playing cards on the tables; no obscene pictures on the walls, no soiled clothing on the floor, no ill-smelling bottles around. These things are the invariable sign of the bootlegger and by the time he creates the right "atmosphere" he won't be a bootlegger any longer.

—F. A. Hazeltine.

John Barleycorn is like a vicious maniac who writhes violently for some time after he gets into the strait-jacket.

The net will tighten, in time. State legislatures may have to amend laws, making it a death penalty to sell wood alcohol and other poisons disguised as drinkables.

What prohibition needs most is realization by all citizens that, when they buy liquor illicitly, they are aiding and abetting a super-criminal organization.

The guiltiest party is the one who supports it by buying.

Shall Children Sign the Pledge?

Evie Morelen Studley

When I was a little girl, my father, a Methodist minister in a New England village, held an evening meeting at a school house about five miles from our comfortable parsonage. An elderly sexton who had come to build the fire and light up was the only person present when my father arrived for the purpose named. Many times friendly shelter for the minister's horse had been offered at a near-by house and the sexton accompanied father there. As the men entered the yard, the good woman of the house came to the door and said, "Drive right in, Brother Morelen. Plenty of hay if you want to feed your horse. After you've put him up, come in, I've a treat for you."

In a few moments my father and the sexton went to the door and Mrs. Warren announced, "We have some new cider just from the press. We want you to taste it." "Thank you, Mrs. Warren," said my father. "I cannot do that. When I was a little boy only eight years old I promised not to drink any kind of alcoholic drink, including wine, beer or cider. You wouldn't have me break my promise that I've kept all these years, would you?" "Oh, no," replied Mrs. Warren, "but this isn't cider; it is just apple juice only a few days old."

"It is so difficult to decide just when apple juice becomes cider that I never drink it," said my father firmly.

The two men had just started for the evening service, when his elderly companion grasped my father by the arm so tightly that it startled him, as looking intently into his face, the old man, white with emotion, said with nervous intensity:

"Brother Morelen, do you know what you have done for me tonight?"

"Why, no!" was my father's astonished reply.

"You didn't realize, but when you refused that cider you almost, if not quite, saved my life. I used to be one of the worst cider drunkards anywhere around. When God converted me five years ago I gave up drinking, but, at times I've had an almost uncontrollable craving for cider. Today I've seen the farmers hauling cider from the mill above here and I just had to fight to keep from drinking. I came to prayer meeting to get strength to overcome the temptation. When Mrs. Warren offered you that cider I trembled; I tried to run away but I couldn't seem to move. If you had drunk any of that cider I could not have resisted and I should have gone on until I had had a regular spree."

The next morning at family prayers my father, in a most impressive manner, told us the story, and my sister and brother and I determined that we never would offer to any one alcoholic drinks. We realized that many men become drunkards just from drinking cider.

George Bernard Shaw thus trenchantly and uniquely gives his reason for advocating prohibition in England: "If a natural choice between drunkenness and sobriety were possible in our civilization, I would leave the people free to choose; but when I see an enormous capitalistic organization pushing drink under the people's noses at every corner and pocketing the price while leaving me and others to pay the colossal damages, then I am prepared to smash that organization and make it as easy for the poor man to be sober if he wants as it is for his dog."

Easy Questions About Familiar Things

Why does alcohol cool the body when used externally, and seem to warm the body when taken internally?

Alcoholic Effects

When used externally, alcohol makes the body feel cool for the same reason that water does. In each case, the liquid evaporates, and since the heat is necessary to change a liquid into a gas, the water or the alcohol takes the heat from the body, to which it is closest.

When used internally, alcohol affects the nerves that control the small blood vessels in the skin in such a way that they are dilated. This results in a rush of blood to the surface of the body, which causes a warm feeling. On a warm day, it is the heat of the atmosphere expanding the blood-vessels near the surface that gives the warm feeling. But with alcohol as the dilating agent, what is actually happening is that the body is being unduly cooled, because so much blood is being brought to the surface. Because of this fact a drunken man may freeze to death despite his first deceptive feeling of warmth.

The New York World laments the high cost of prohibition, but entirely overlooks the high cost of open saloons. No one, who has watched the working out of the prohibition law in this state, has expected national prohibition to become effective in a year or two. The habit of drinking is too deeply seated for that, and only those who insist upon filling their stomachs with alcoholic stuff can truthfully insist that whisky is a good thing for mankind. Every mother's son of them knows better. It is true that prohibition costs money. Every good thing costs money. And it is a shame that it should cost so much to teach human beings to let alone those things that are bad for them. An animal doesn't have to be taught such wisdom.

The Enemy

Frances S. Hallowes

(The S. S. "Persia", bound for India, has among its passengers Major Orde and Bertram Harford, who have become acquainted with a Mrs. Carlyle, her small son, Eric, and Angela O'Connor, who, in the charge of Mrs. Carlyle, is on her way to marry a Deputy Commissioner at Seraneb. Harford, who is a total abstainer, is glad to note that Angela refuses to drink, and the two become good friends. Consequently, Harford is much shocked to learn that Angela has been induced by Mrs. Carlyle to take some whisky for seasickness and has been overcome by the liquor. Through pity for her he breaks his reticence on the subject, and tells her that both his parents were victims of drink, and that he had promised his mother on her deathbed never to touch alcohol in any form. Angela admits that she has made her mother a similar promise, but does not mention any particular reason therefor. At Bombay Angela is met by her fiance, Frank Fortescue, and the wedding takes place. After a long railroad journey they arrive at Seraneb. During the course of the first dinner in the new home, Fortescue urges wine upon his wife, much to the distress of Divan Singh, a Christian native in charge of Fortescue's establishment.)

CHAPTER XII.

Christmas drew near: it lacked but a week to the festival, when the English mail brought Angela a letter which covered her face with smiles and filled her heart with joy.

"Mother and Mr. Mortimer arrive in Bombay next Thursday, Frank; they will be here on Christmas Eve."

"That's right. We must get up some 'tamashas' for them. Is Mr. Mortimer much of a Yankee?"

"He is the very nicest man I know, not excepting you, Frank," Angela said, teasingly.

"That is not an answer to my question."

"Do you mean does he speak with an American drawl? No, he does not."

"Does he say 'tempor*ary*' and 'lumin*ary*'?"

"Oh, he may, but I like that; it is as good as putting the accent on the first syllable. Americans seem to me to be much more awake than we are, and less afflicted by cnnui."

"My angel, I shall be jealous if you go on in praise of Americans."

Great preparations were made; food, wine, flowers provided in profusion, invitations sent out.

The happy day arrived.

What a meeting that was! Mother and daughter flew together.

"My darling, let me look at you!" Mrs. Mortimer held her at arm's length.

"Frank, are you treating her well?"

"Hope so, what do you say, Angela? Don't I give you your own way?"

A shade passed over her face. "Do you, Frank?"

"When it is good for you, little woman."

Mrs. Mortimer was a tall and graceful woman, with the same regular features as her daughter. Her beautiful eyes had a mournful expression as if life had held an agony for her.

When the excitement of meeting was over, the mournful look was very evident. She was not satisfied with her child's appearance. There was an indefinable coarsening of Angela's expression, some of the exquisite delicacy of skin had vanished, and her eyes were less frank and clear than of old.

"'It may be but the effect of the Indian climate," she said to herself.

The dinner was a great affair, planned and carried out by Divan Singh in honor of the Mem Sahib's "Ma Bap" (mother and father).

There were wines and liqueurs in profusion: at least seven kinds were served.

"No wine! Mr. Mortimer, do you mean it?" exclaimed Fortescue, as his guest refused each in turn.

"I have simple tastes, you see," said Mr. Mortimer, smiling at his wife. "That is why my wife married me."

Mrs. Mortimer smiled back. "For that and many other virtues," she replied.

"Strange for you both to refuse it. Live awhile in India and you will be like Angela—take to it and like it, eh! little wife?"

Mrs. Mortimer looked startled and glanced sharply at her daughter, but she said nothing then, and the dinner proceeded without any more reference being made to the subject.

The ladies passed into the room beyond.

"My child, what is this?"

"Frank made such a point of my drinking wine, Mother. I was obliged to give way."

"Angela, this is a blow for me. Could you not hold your own?"

Angela said nothing. Her mother looking into the beautiful face that was suddenly drenched in tears, gathered the slight form into her arms with a quick sob. "My poor, helpless, timid child," she said, holding her tight, as if to shield her from some imaginary foe.

"Oh, Mother, Mother, love me; be sorry for me. Don't you understand how I tried to keep my promise?"

"I believe you, darling; there, don't cry. Tell me all about it."

They sat down together on the lounge.

"I told Frank of my promise to you and he said, 'You owe me first obedience now.' What could I do?"

"And you don't like wine, and would rather not take it, Angela?"

"Yes, sometimes I feel dreary and chill now unless I have it every day."

Mrs. Mortimer clasped her daughter's hand.

"My poor child, you are hypnotized by it."

"Hypnotized! yes, that word just describes it. I am held by a power outside me. But do you not feel this? I am your child."

"My darling, you are also the child of your father. I have never told you but now I must do so: he died poisoned by this cruel drink."

"Oh, Mother, why did I not know?"

"My sweet one, I wanted to shield you from the hideous knowledge. Why should your fresh youth be shadowed by sin and its nemesis?"

"But, Mother, it might have helped me to stand firm."

"True, I am wrong, dear child, forgive me! I am to blame!—Listen! When I married your father, life was a happy dream. He seemed to me to be the truest, gentlest, purest man on earth. But he drank more than moderately. I, in my ignorance, thought my love would soon set this failing right. But three months before your birth I found him dead drunk in his study. Oh, child! the horror of it!"

Mrs. Mortimer clasped her hands over her eyes as if to shut out a sight of fierce misery.

"I was a novice in the art of suffering but before you were born, I had learned to suffer and be still. I vowed to shield him, pitying him as a dipsomaniac, and put away everything alcoholic from the house. But his fierce craving made him more cunning than a fox. My efforts to protect and save him counted for little against the influence of the world, with its drink shops and clubs, and its homes where well-bred women and cultured men were his enemies. They fostered his fatal weakness by their so-called moderation. Soon my hideous secret became public property. Pity, no doubt, I had, but no help! By degrees we were dropped by society."

Mrs. Mortimer laid her hand heavily on Angela's shoulder. "Remember this, those who provide temptation are the first to drop your acquaintance when you are in need of friends. We are allowed to go to the dogs, while their so-called friendly hospitality is extended to others equally liable to destruction. It is so easy in society to make light of another's downfall."

"Yes, Mother; and what became of father?" asked Angela, breathlessly.

"Your father became brutal to me, whom once he loved tenderly. He tried to kill me; there is no madness so cruel as that born of the lust for drink; to injure the very woman who was fighting for his soul with the devil! Ah! His manhood was soaked away, drowned in alcohol! He became mad, and died in a lunatic asylum when you were eleven years old. Is it not a hideous story?"

Angela stopped breathing for a moment, horrified at this recital; then burst into tears.

"Angela, I have told you these sordid details for your own salvation. You are in danger. You know now your sad inheritance."

"Do you mean, Mother, that I inherit this awful love of drink."

"My child, hush! It breaks my heart to even think that such a thing is possible, but we must face the facts of heredity. In case you have this taint in your blood, do nothing to develop it; give up everything alcoholic."

"I must! I must! Help me! stay, live with me and shield me from my husband!"

"Angela! what can you mean?"

"Mother, he cares only for my looks to adorn his position, not for my soul and character."

"Hush, dear! he is a good husband, is he not?"

"He is kind and generous, but I want one who is strong and helpful, to be a friend to advise and support."

"I will see Frank and let him know our story. Now, dear child, good-night. Go and rest; you are worn out."

During the momentous conversation between Angela and her mother, the men sat on in the dining-room, discussing kindred topics.

"I can't understand you water drinkers." said Fortescue.

"We have science on our side in favor of our water drinking," replied Mortimer.

"But you controvert all the customs of society; what a dull world you would make of it!"

"My dear sir, it would be a merrier, happier world without alcohol! Men and women do not need to pour ardent spirits down to keep their spirits up. What! shall sane people continue to damage humanity because of a supposed but already exploded superstition that strong drink adds to health? If so, then your own Royal Commission on physical deterioration must be greatly in the wrong. It says that 'alcohol has fatal effects on physical efficiency,' and your great Sir Frederick Treves has said that 'No young man can be "fit" who takes alcohol.'"

"Well, I for one am 'fit,'" said Fortescue, drawing himself up as if to show his fine development.

"May I ask how old you are?"

"Forty; and you?"

"Sixty-two."

"Sixty-two! I should have said not more than fifty-two! Tell me, have you always been an abstainer?"

"No, I was brought up to take wine. My father was a General in the United States Army. As a youngster at school I often got a drink on account of his past victories. Again at West Point—for I was in the same profession. And I found these offered drinks so constant, that I could not drink moderately. I could not say 'No' to such offers, so I determined to become an absolute abstainer—a crank—if you like! When a man can say 'I never drink,' he is not urged, and seldom offends by saying 'No!' At least that is my experience."

"Well, I can be moderate. I am never tempted to take more than is good for me!"

"My dear sir! the latest medical science of your own country is now declaring that small doses taken repeatedly, through long years, produce alcoholic poisoning with as equal certainty, as large quantities taken at intervals!"

"Excuse me, but my life is as sound as yours, though I am a moderate drinker!"

"You think so; well! we can neither of us look inside to see, but if I betted, I'd take odds that your nerves would not stand any great test!"

"You're apparently capable of a good deal, but tell me if you had any great native riot to deal with suddenly, what would you do first?"

"Take a stiff peg to steady my nerves."

"There you are! just at the critical time you would take that which would paralyze your nerves. How many a man has failed at an important juncture, because his brain has been clouded by alcohol taken for the purpose of 'steadying!' Would you prefer to be driven in your motor by a chauffeur who took drink to 'steady his nerves,' to one who was an abstainer?"

"Oh, that's a different matter; it would be infernal idiocy to have a drinking chauffeur!"

"Not at all, if you really believe alcohol steadies the nerves."

Fortescue shrugged his shoulders and turned the conversation.

Presently Mrs. Mortimer entered the dining-room with a mournful look in her eyes.

"It is late, Frank, but if you are not too tired, may I have a little conversation with you?"

Mr. Mortimer left the room and his wife was soon telling again that dire story of her past to the husband of her child.

"You will blame me, no doubt, for hiding this story, Frank! I can but say I did it for my child's happiness."

"And why tell it to me now?"

"Because I want you to see the danger of allowing Angela to take strong drink."

Fortescue laughed lightly. "My dear mother-in-law, do you think I can't take care of my own wife? And as for danger, why half, nay, two-thirds of us English have had parents who drank more than was good for them, if these latter day scientists are to be believed."

"Do be more serious, Frank! I beg you to consider it in the gravest light; say now if Angela has inherited alcoholism, what should be your methods of shielding her?"

"Prohibit her from taking it, I suppose."

"Yes, and more than that, remove the temptation from your home!"

Again Fortescue laughed. "And give it up myself?"

"Yes, certainly, and let her go to no place alone where she will be offered drink."

"My dear Mrs. Mortimer, you wish to revolutionize the habits of forty years for a supposed—mind you, it is not proved—taste for alcohol in your daughter. Really it seems to me quite absurd. Angela likes it and it does her good, and I'll trust her to refuse more than is good for her."

"Oh, Frank, I have bared my terrible past to show you the need! What can I do more?"

"Nothing; I will watch over my wife, you may be sure. Cheer up, Mrs. Mortimer, don't get morbid!"

She left him without another word.

How prohibition is enforced in the navy ought to interest federal officers and courts, as well as all private citizens of peaceful nature. Five petty officers, found guilty of smuggling alcoholic liquors into the United States from Cuba, have been sentenced to reduction to the lowest grade of the navy, imprisonment for one year, and dishonorable discharge. That is stern enough to deter others. Enforcing respect for law is largely a matter of exemplary punishment, as the layman sees the situation. Men who are not reached by reason or conscience can be held back by fear. Prison sentences strike terror into the hearts of all but the most callous.—East St. Louis (Ill.) Journal.

The Big Ten

Della F. Withers, Circulation Manager

Our records on March 31 show a gain in every one of the Big Ten States. Kansas has quietly left "The Next Ten" class and entered the headliners, even passing Massachusetts, and leaving California (North) leading the second group. Iowa put on her list during the month of March 139 subscribers to the weekly UNION SIGNAL and 56 to the monthly.

We find Minnesota has moved from fourth to second place. Florida has passed Michigan. Oklahoma advanced one step higher up and Virgina joined the crowd, displacing Maryland, but only by nine subscriptions, so Maryland may be on again next time.

Watch, Watch the Renewals!

Please, Oh Please!!

After seven months of tearing down walls, and building up walls, having constant companionship with representatives of all the trades, and their tools, we rejoice in being settled and beautifully and conveniently housed in our new National W. C. T. U. Headquarters building. We have arrived at the peaceful stage of knowing where our supplies are and where to put things. We are inspired with a great desire to do good work and are asking all who send subscriptions to please help us by observing the following rules:

(1) Write plainly; dot your i's; cross your t's; print the name, if unusual, and you have not made it plain.

(2) Be sure the right street address, as well as town and state, are given. If a married woman, give her own and her husband's first name or initials.

(3) See to it no subscriber's name is omitted from your list. It will be a help to you to number the names.. Grouping weekly, monthly and Young Crusader subscriptions separately will assist you in your figuring and aid us in entering the names.

(4) Figure carefully the amount needed to cover the subscriptions. The prices are given at beginning of this column.

(5) Sign your name and address. We cannot receipt unless we know the sender.

(6) Read your order over carefully. See that money order or draft is attached to letter.

To do these things may take a few moments longer but it will be time well spent. A name omitted or a wrong address is the cause of much trouble to every one concerned.

Do not think for a second that the Circulation department is to blame for all mistakes. We can prove that over one-half the errors are made before we receive the order. We are fairly good detectives but not mind readers.

What Can We Do to Further Law Enforcement?

"The time is at hand when parents and teachers and publicists and statesmen all must get down to sober, solid, God-fearing thinking and acting. Let us teach that right must be the rule of action because it is right—for conscience sake. We must re-establish private life, domestic concerns and state affairs upon the firm foundation of the Rock of Ages. To fear God and keep His commandments is the fundamental duty of mankind.

"As a final word, let me exhort you as good, loyal citizens of this great Republic, to lose no opportunity to agitate, educate and arouse on this great, vital issue of making this a law-abiding and God-fearing nation. 'For the nation and kingdom that will not serve Thee shall perish; yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted.'"
